

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. LAWYERS' REPORTS

ANNOTATED.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

LOUISVILLE TOBACCO WAREHOUSE COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
COMMONWEALTH of Kentucky.

(.....Ky.....)

1. An ordinary business corporation created under the general law, under which no special or exclusive privilege not allowed by law to natural persons can be obtained is not subject to the franchise tax imposed by Stat. § 4077, on railway, gas, ferry, bridge, express, and every other like company, and every other corporation having "any special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons, or performing any public service."
2. An exclusive privilege not enjoyed by natural persons, within the meaning of Stat. § 4077, relating to a franchise tax, is not created by a proviso in articles of incorporation, that the private property of stockholders shall not be subject to corporate debts.

3. The exemption of corporations which do not have any special privileges and franchises from the operation of a statute imposing a franchise tax on corporations which do have such franchises or privileges does not make the statute unconstitutional for lack of uniformity.
4. A public service which will render a corporation subject to the franchise tax imposed by Stat. § 4077, is not performed by a corporation engaged in the business of a tobacco warehouseman.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Franklin County convicting it of wilfully failing to file with the auditor a statement for purposes of taxation, as required by the Kentucky statutes. Reversed.

Defendant contended that it was a private corporation, and that it was not included within the meaning of the statute requiring the filing of such statements. The court of appeals on the first hearing of the case handed down an opinion December 13, 1898, in which it was held that defendant was within the terms of the statute. A petition for rehearing was subsequently granted, after which the opinion printed herewith was handed down.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. D. W. Lindsey and Humphrey & Davis for appellant.

I. Proem.

a. Scope of note.

This note is a commentary, within bounds referred to in the body, upon five classes of taxes upon corporations in the United States, namely: (1) Organization taxes, or taxes exacted of domestic corporations for the grant of corporate powers; (2) franchise taxes, or taxes in the nature of royalties annexed to the grant and levied periodically, usually annually, upon domestic corporations; (3) license taxes,—not licenses under the police power,—or taxes charged by a state to foreign corporations for leave to enter and do business in its territory; (4) privilege taxes, or taxes imposed upon foreign corporations on account of exercising their corporate franchises within the limits of the taxing state; and (5) taxes upon franchisees, eo nomine.

Of these, the first four classes are essentially, howsoever designated in the statutes and decisions, capitation taxes upon artificial entities, and the fifth class, true franchise taxes. The classes, however, are seldom carefully discriminated.

Religious, benevolent, charitable, fraternal, educational, and scientific associations, whether incorporated or not, have not been included. Neither have building and loan associations, cemetery companies, and like organizations for profit. And national banks are so plainly separated from corporations generally that they, too, have been omitted.

b. Definitions of terms employed.

Throughout this note corporations are called domestic in the state of their origin and foreign in all other jurisdictions. Thus, a corporation organized under the laws of New York is called a domestic one in that state alone; if it does business in any other state of the Union it is there deemed a foreign corporation; and, conversely, in New York a corporation organized under the laws of any other state or of the United States is a foreign corporation.

II. Power and jurisdiction of a state to tax.

The right of taxation is an incident of sovereignty and coextensive with sovereignty. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. ed. 579; Jones v. Page, 44 Ala. 657.

And where there is no constitutional restriction upon it, the power to tax is absolute. Citizens' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Lott, 45 Ala. 185.

The right to tax being necessary to the very

Mr. Robert B. Franklin for the Commonwealth.

De Belle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Most of the questions presented by the briefs in this case have been settled by the opinion recently delivered at this term in the case of Louisville & J. Ferry Co. v. Com. 104 Ky. 726, 47 S. W. 877. The sole question remaining for decision is whether a private trading corporation is required to make a report to the auditor, as a basis for the ascertainment of a tax upon its franchise.

The statute (Ky. Stat. § 4077) provides: "Every railway company or corporation and every incorporated bank, trust company, guaranty or security company, gas company, water company, ferry company, existence of a state, the power, save when restrained by constitutions or the fundamental principles of natural justice, is supreme. Colts v. Society for Savings, 32 Conn. 173.

All subjects over which the sovereign power of the state extends are objects of taxation. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. ed. 579.

Resting as it does in necessity, the right to tax is inherent in every government, and in the United States is vested in the state legislatures, which possess, when unrestrained by national or state constitutions, plenary power over the subject; hence, he who denies the constitutionality of a taxing statute assumes the burden of showing clearly wherein it violates the fundamental law. Porter v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. 78 Ill. 561.

The power of the state, unless constitutionally restricted, as to the mode, form, and extent of taxation, is without limit where the subject to which it applies is within her jurisdiction. State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300, sub nom. Cleveland, P. & A. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 179; State, Central R. Co. Prosecutor, v. State Bd. of Assessors, 48 N. J. L. 1, 57 Am. Rep. 516, 2 Atl. 789.

But those subjects over which sovereignty does not extend are upon the plainest principles exempt from taxation. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. ed. 579.

Except as constitutionally limited, the power of the legislature over the subject of taxation is unbounded. Re McPherson, 104 N. Y. 306, 58 Am. Rep. 502, 10 N. E. 685.

When justice requires the exercise of the unlimited (except by the Constitution) power of the legislature to levy taxes, neither the statute of limitations, nor laches, will bar its exercise. State v. Kings County, 125 N. Y. 312, 26 N. E. 272, per Ruger, Ch. J.

The power to tax is a sovereign right belonging alone to the state, and which is and only can be exercised pursuant to laws enacted for the purpose. State ex rel. Clinton County v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 87 Mo. 236.

The power of taxation possessed by the state is a very broad and comprehensive one, and may, with some exceptions imposed by the Federal Constitution and laws passed in pursuance thereof, be exercised upon all objects within its jurisdiction. Persons and property within the state, and trades, avocations, and other business carried on therein under the protection of its laws, whether by citizens or non-residents, may be taxed. But nonresidents, property having no legal situs there, and business not carried on there, are beyond the juris-bridge company, street railway company, express company, electric light company, electric power company, telegraph company, press despatch company, telephone company, turnpike company, palace-car company, dining-car company, sleeping-car company, chair-car company, and every other like company, corporation, or association, also every other corporation, company, or association having or exercising any special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons, or performing any public service, shall, in addition to the other taxes imposed on it by law, annually pay a tax on its franchise to the state, and a local tax thereon to the county, incorporated city, town and taxing district where its franchise may be exercised," etc. By the next section it is provided: "In order to determine the value of the franchises mentioned in the next preceding section, the corporations, companies, and associations mentioned in the next preceding section, except banks and trust companies, whose statements shall be filed as hereinafter required by § 4092 of this article, shall annually, between the fifteenth day of September and first day of October, make and deliver to the auditor of public accounts of this state a statement verified by its president, cashier, secretary, treasurer, manager, or other chief officer or agent, in such form as the auditor may prescribe, showing the following facts," etc. By § 4079, it is provided that the auditor, secretary of state, and treasurer, constituting the board of valuation, shall, "from said statement [of the corporation], and from such other evidence as it may have, . . . fix the value of the capital stock of the corporation; diction of a state, and are not the subjects of taxation there. People v. Equitable Trust Co. 96 N. Y. 387, 393, per Earl, J.

The taxing power passes to a territory under a general grant of legislative power in the organizing act without other limitations than those contained in the act itself, or in the United States Constitution. Northern P. E. Co. v. Barnes, 2 N. D. 810, 51 N. W. 886.

Whether a state statute is an exercise of the taxing power, or the police power, or any other state power, it must still be subordinate to the Federal Constitution, and, if plainly in conflict with any provision thereof, cannot stand. Henderson v. New York, 92 U. S. 259, sub nom. Henderson v. Wickham, 23 L. ed. 543.

But, as McLean, J., well says: In a system of government so complex as ours it may be difficult, perhaps impracticable, to prescribe the exact limit in particular cases to Federal and state powers. License Cases, 5 How. 504, 588, 12 L. ed. 256, 294.

If, says Marshall, Ch. J., we measure the power of taxation residing in a sovereignty which the people of a single state possess and can confer on its government, we have an intelligible standard applicable to every case to which the power may be applied. We have a principle which leaves the power of taxing the people and property unimpaired, which leaves to a state the command of all its resources, and which places beyond its reach all those powers which are conferred by the people of the United States on the government of the Union, and all those means which are given for the purpose of carrying those powers into execution. We have a principle which is safe for the states, and safe for the Union. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 429, 4 L. ed. 579, 607.

III. Some general principles.

Private corporations may be taxed by the state for the support of the state government. Their privileges and franchises, unless exempted in terms which amount to a contract, are legitimate subjects of taxation,—as much so, as any other property of the citizen which enjoys the protection and is within the control of the sovereign power of the state. The state power to tax such franchisees and privileges is independent of the Federal government. And the taxation of corporate franchisees and privileges rests in the discretion of the legislature of the taxing state, which may decide whether the sum to be levied be a fixed one, and, if not, in what manner and by what means the amount shall be determined. Society for 57 L. R. A.

Savings v. Colte, 6 Wall. 594, 18 L. ed. 897; Provident Inst. for Savings v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 611, 18 L. ed. 907; Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 632, 18 L. ed. 904.

The right of corporate existence being by nature indivisible, a license tax therefor is of necessity entire regardless of the manner of employing the corporate capital or the location of the corporate property. Lumberville Delaware Bridge Co. v. State Bd. of Assessors, 55 N. J. L. 529, sub nom. State, Lumberville Delaware Bridge Co., Prosecutors v. State Bd. of Assessors, 25 L. R. A. 134, 26 Atl. 711.

A legislature having a legal right to impose a privilege tax has a discretion to fix its amount. Knoxville & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 99 Tenn. 684, 53 L. R. A. 921, 43 S. W. 115.

The extent of the tax is entirely within the discretion of the taxing power. Southern Car & Foundry Co. v. State (Ala.) 32 So. 233.

Beside a franchise tax upon a domestic corporation for a right of life and continued existence and the powers that go therewith, or upon a foreign corporation for the privilege of doing business in the state, an excise tax may also be laid upon corporations for the additional burden sustained by the state and the people by reason of property being held by artificial bodies, the persons composing such bodies being exempt, to a great extent, from liability for the debts thereof. Southern Gum Co. v. Laylin (Ohio) 64 N. E. 564.

IV. What are franchisees?

a. In general.

The lexicographers agree in defining franchises as privileges granted by the sovereign power in a state to individuals, and in them vesting. Blackstone (4 Com. 159) defines a franchise as a royal privilege or branch of the Crown's prerogative subsisting in the hands of a subject. Bouvier (Law Dict. 545) as a certain privilege conferred by grant from the government and vested in individuals, adding that corporations or bodies politic are the most usual franchisees known to our law.

Clifford, J., says that it was, inter alia, decided in the case of Society for Savings v. Colte, 6 Wall. 594, 18 L. ed. 897, that corporate franchisees are legal estates, and not mere naked powers, but powers coupled with an interest, which vest in the corporation by virtue of its charter. Provident Inst. for Savings v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 611, 18 L. ed. 907.

Taney, Ch. J., speaks of franchisees as special privileges conferred by government upon individuals, and which do not belong to the

. . . and from the amount thus fixed shall deduct the assessed value of all tangible property assessed in this state, or in the counties where situated. The remainder thus found shall be the value of its corporate franchise subject to taxation as aforesaid." From these provisions it is manifest that the so-called franchise tax is in reality a property tax upon all the intangible property of the corporations named in the act. And so, in Henderson Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 166 U. S. 154, 41 L. ed. 954, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 534, the Supreme Court, in considering this statute, said: "The tax in controversy was nothing more than a tax on the intangible property of the company in Kentucky, and was sustained as such by the court of appeals." And in Adams Exp. Co. v. Kentucky, 166 U. S. 180, 41 L. ed. 963, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 530, the Supreme Court said: "We agree with the circuit court that it is evident that the word 'franchise' was not employed in a technical sense; and that the legislative intention is plain that the entire property, tangible and intangible, of all foreign and domestic corporations, and all foreign and domestic companies, possessing no franchise, should be valued as an entirety, the value of the tangible property be deducted, and the value of the intangible property thus ascertained be taxed under these provisions." And so this court in Henderson Bridge Co. v. Com. 99 Ky. 639, 29 L. R. A. 73, 31 S. W. 486, held that the term "intangible property" was used as synonymous with "franchises." The sections we have referred to show conclusively that their object was to obtain a valuation of property for the purpose of taxation. The corporate property sought by citizens of a country generally of common right. And he declares it essential to the character of a franchise that it should be a grant from the sovereign authority, and that in this country no franchise can be held which is not derived from a law of the state. Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274.

This definition is accepted in his own state. State v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 45 Md. 361, 24 Am. Rep. 511.

It is, says Strong, J., writing for the court, in Atlantic & G. R. Co. v. Georgia, 98 U. S. 359, 385, 25 L. ed. 185, 187, quite too narrow a definition of the word "franchise" to hold it as meaning only the right to be a corporation. The word is generic, covering all the rights granted by the legislature.

The term "corporate franchise or business," as used in the New York tax laws, means the right or privilege given by the state to two or more persons of being a corporation,—that is, of doing business in a corporate capacity; and not the privilege or franchise which, when incorporated, the company may exercise. Home Ins. Co. v. New York, 134 U. S. 594, 33 L. ed. 1025, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 593.

A domestic corporation is given life and continued existence by the state, and this life and existence, with their accompanying powers, constitute the franchise. Southern Gum Co. v. Laylin (Ohio) 64 N. E. 564.

b. Within tax laws.

Section 1.

The word "franchise" in its appropriate and legal sense is confined to such rights and privileges as are conferred upon corporate bodies by legislative grant. Fletsam v. Hay, 122 Ill. 293, 13 N. E. 501.

The privilege or right to be a corporation is a franchise. People v. O'Hair, 128 Ill. 22, 21 N. E. 211; Bushnell v. Consolidated Ice Mach. Co. 37 Ill. App. 133.

And an excise tax upon the right of a corporation to be is entirely distinct from, and not in lieu of, a tax upon the franchise to do. Chehalis Boom Co. v. Chehalis County, 24 Wash. 135, 63 Pac. 1123.

The franchise of a railroad is the privilege of running it and taking fare and freight. Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Reid, 13 Wall. 264, 20 L. ed. 568.

A consent of the public authorities to the carrying on of business by a gas company, and to the laying of its mains for conducting and supplying illuminating gas, is a grant of a franchise. People ex rel. Woodhaven Gaslight 57 L. R. A.

Co. v. Deehan, 153 N. Y. 528, 47 N. E. 787; San José Gas Co. v. January, 57 Cal. 614.

The power to consolidate is the grant of a corporate franchise. Adams v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. 77 Miss. 194, 24 So. 200, 317, 28 So. 956.

The right granted by public authority to a domestic corporation formed for the purpose of establishing and maintaining booms in navigable streams made public highways, and of collecting tolls for logs and timber boomed, is a privilege or franchise, and is taxable as such, although it is not exclusive, and is open and common to every person and corporation to acquire under the same authority. Chehalis Boom Co. v. Chehalis County, 24 Wash. 135, 63 Pac. 1123. Following Commercial Electric Light & P. Co. v. Judson, 21 Wash. 49, 56 Pac. 829; and Edison Electric Illum. Co. v. Spokane County, 22 Wash. 168, 60 Pac. 132.

A right granted by a municipality to an individual to erect on the water front a bulkhead or wharf, and to receive fees or dues from vessels mooring thereat, to receive and discharge cargoes, without title to the soil, constitutes an incorporated hereditament. Boreel v. New York, 2 Sandf. 552.

The right given in a general railroad act to railroads to cross public highways is a franchise or privilege taxable under a law defining special railroad franchises subject to taxation as all franchises, rights, or permission to construct, maintain, or operate a railway in, under, above, on, or through streets, highways, or public places. New York, L. & W. R. Co. v. Roll, 32 Misc. 321, 66 N. Y. Supp. 748.

There are two classes of corporate franchises, viz.: Those in their nature purely incorporeal and inalienable, dependent upon the continued existence of the donee, such as the right of corporate life, the exercise of banking, trading, and insurance powers, and similar privileges which die with the corporation, and those requiring for their enjoyment the use of corporeal property, such as railroad, canal, telegraph, gas, water, bridge, and similar companies, which, with the consent of the state, of course, are transferable to the corporate successors and assigns. People v. O'Brien, 111 N. Y. 1, 2 L. R. A. 255, 18 N. E. 692.

Section 2.

But a right common to every citizen, such as the right to acquire and own property,—in this case a billiard table,—cannot be converted into a taxable privilege by first prohibiting its exercise and then permitting its enjoyment by such only as will pay a tax prescribed by the

this statute to be subjected to taxation may be said to be the added value which the exercise by the corporation of any special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons gives to the tangible property. For example, a railroad track, without the right of operating a railroad, would be of small value; with that right, it might be worth millions of dollars. So, in ascertaining what corporations come within the purview of this statute, and are by it required to make report to the auditor, we should keep in mind the ultimate purpose of the statute, which is the taxation of this intangible property, and consider whether all corporations can, in law, possess such intangible property; for surely we are not to stretch the language of the statute beyond its letter, and assume that the legislature intended to require a vain thing, by imposing severe penalties for failure to report intangible property upon corporations which do not, and in law cannot, possess it. The appellant is an ordinary business corporation, created under the general law, under which no special or exclusive privilege not allowed by law to natural persons can be obtained. It conducts its business with the same rights and privileges, and subject to the same restrictions, as natural persons engaged in the same business.

It is insisted—and appears to have been so decided by the trial court—that the insertion in the articles of incorporation of a proviso that the private property of stockholders should not be subject to the corporate debts gave to the corporation an exclusive privilege not enjoyed by natural persons, and therefore brought this corpostatute. Stevens v. State, 2 Ark. 291, 35 Am. Dec. 72.

And a privilege given by a general county ordinance to any person, firm, association, or corporation engaged in supplying fresh water to any city, town, or county in the state to lay down and maintain pipes as conduits in or through any of the roads and highways of the county, without any right to take tolls or collect water rates therein, or to enjoy any special advantage or prerogative not open to all, confers a mere right of way, and not a franchise taxable as such. Spring Valley Waterworks v. Barber, 99 Cal. 36, 21 L. R. A. 416, 83 Pac. 735.

So, too, a private railroad built upon private lands belonging to a corporation not a railroad company and not used or operated under any franchise, but a mere means of transportation to the owner's grounds of the patrons thereof, is not within a general statute for the taxation of railroads and canals operated or owned under a franchise by individuals or unincorporated associations or companies. State, Monmouth Park Assn., Prosecutor, v. State Bd. of Assessors, 60 N. J. L. 372, 37 Atl. 729.

A permission given by private individual owners of the fee is not a franchise, and is not taxable within the New York tax law (§ 2, subd. 3, as amended by chap. 712, Laws 1899), defining as taxable property a franchise, right, authority, or permission to lay pipes or mains in or under a public street. People ex rel. Retsof Min. Co. v. Priest, 77 N. Y. Supp. 382. See, also, The Park Tax Case, 84 Md. 1, sub nom. Baltimore v. Baltimore & E. M. Pass. R. Co. 33 L. R. A. 503, 35 Atl. 17.

c. Nature as subjects of taxation.

There is almost a consensus of opinion that corporate franchises are property. Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 3 How. 133, 11 L. ed. 529; Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Reid, 13 Wall. 264, 20 L. ed. 568; New Orleans City & L. R. Co. v. New Orleans, 143 U. S. 192, 36 L. ed. 121, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 406; San José Gas Co. v. January, 57 Cal. 614; Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69; Stein v. Mobile, 17 Ala. 234; Enfield Toll Bridge Co. v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 17 Conn. 40, 41 Am. Dec. 141; Porter v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. 76 Ill. 561; Belleville Nail Co. v. People, 98 Ill. 399; Flitsam v. Hay, 122 Ill. 293, 13 N. E. 501; Baltimore v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 6 Gill, 288, 48 Am. Dec. 531; Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. 252; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Com. 133 Mass. 161; State Bd. of Assessors v. Central R. Co. 48 N. J. L. 146, 4 Atl. 578; 57 L. R. A.

Monroe County Sav. Bank v. Rochester, 37 N. Y. 367; People ex rel. Panama R. Co. v. New York Tax Comr. 104 N. Y. 240, 10 N. E. 437; Coney Island, Ft. H. & B. R. Co. v. Kennedy, 15 App. Div. 588, 44 N. Y. Supp. 825; People v. O'Brien, 111 N. Y. 1, 2 L. R. A. 255, 18 N. E. 692; People ex rel. Woodhaven Gaslight Co. v. Deehan, 153 N. Y. 528, 47 N. E. 787; South Nashville Street R. Co. v. Morrow, 87 Tenn. 406, 2 L. R. A. 853, 11 S. W. 348; Knoxville & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 99 Tenn. 684, 53 L. R. A. 921, 48 S. W. 115.

But it is not wholly unanimous. In Exchange Bank v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1, Bartley, Ch. J., denies that a corporate franchise is property, although admitting that high authority has declared otherwise. His argument in brief is that while a franchise may be a thing of value, value is not the distinguishing attribute of property. The right of suffrage, a public office and its emoluments, are valuable, but neither is property. The things which constitute property are such as the owner may exercise exclusive dominion over,—may use, enjoy, and dispose of without any control or diminution save by the law of the land. The right of alienation, of disposal by sale, gift, or abandonment, is an essential incident to property. (Citing 1 Wendell's Blackstone, 138; Rutherford's Inst. 20; Puffendorf, chap. 9, b. 7; and 2 Kent, Com. 317.) A corporate franchise lacks this essential element. And thereupon in the case coram he concludes that a bank franchise, not being property of any description, is not taxable within a constitutional provision for the taxation of property, effects, or dues of every description without any exception of banks or bankers.

(It may not be amiss to remark here that, whatever may be thought of the conclusion in the particular case, this reasoning, although contrary to the weight of authority, is at least logically consistent with the conclusions so generally adopted and reached in a less direct way, in the very numerous line of cases that have held statutes imposing taxes upon franchises to be outside of constitutional provisions requiring uniformity and equality of property taxation, ad valorem.)

While there is a general agreement that a corporate franchise is property for the purposes of taxation, there is much less concord as to the kind of property that it is.

In Massachusetts it is a "commodity," because the Constitution of that commonwealth empowers the legislature to impose reasonable duties and excises upon commodities within the state, and unless franchises are brought ration within the purview of the statute. This construction would bring every business corporation in the commonwealth within the letter of the statute, and that is the contention made on behalf of appellee. But this privilege is a privilege, not of the corporation, but to the stockholder, and a privilege which every natural person may avail himself of by becoming a stockholder in a corporation. The corporation itself is a distinct entity, making its own contracts, and responsible for its debts, to the uttermost farthing of its assets. It is conceded that a trading corporation has a franchise; but its franchise is merely a franchise to exist, to have a name, to contract and be contracted with, to sue and be sued, in the same manner as a natural person, and this franchise is not a "special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons." Nor can the appellant corporation be said to have any intangible property subject to taxation under this statute. Its tangible property—its warehouse, drays, and personal property—is of no greater value in the hands of the corporation than it would bear if owned and managed by the natural persons who are its stockholders. This is also true of its choses in action, etc. The value of its capital stock must necessarily be the value of its tangible property, choses in action, etc. It had no intangible property subject to taxation under the statute, and, as matter of law, could have none.

This brings us to consider the question whether private business corporations were intended by the legislature to make the report provided for in the statute. The statute enumerates by name twenty different within that provision they may escape taxation. Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. 232; Provident Inst. for Savings v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 611, 18 L. ed. 907; Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 632, 18 L. ed. 904; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Com. 133 Mass. 161.

In Connecticut a franchise is declared to be an incorporeal hereditament, known as a species of property as well as an estate in lands. It may be bought and sold, will descend to heirs, and may be devised. Enfield Toll Bridge Co. v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 17 Conn. 40, 41 Am. Dec. 141.

But in Illinois it does not pass to a general assignee for creditors, although this is said to be because the rights, privileges, powers, and immunities granted to a bank belong, not to it in its corporate capacity, but to the incorporators upon whom they were conferred. Fietsam v. Hay, 122 Ill. 293, 13 N. E. 501.

In New York it was early decided that the powers and privileges constituting the franchises of a corporation were something quite distinct from property which might be acquired by means of them, and that the legislature might classify and tax them as personal property. Monroe County Sav. Bank v. Rochester, 37 N. Y. 367.

Later it was said that these were not for taxing purposes to be reckoned a part of the realty as they were incorporeal rights. People ex rel. Panama R. Co. v. New York Tax Comrs. 104 N. Y. 240, 10 N. E. 437.

Again: That to regard the franchise of a street railway company to use the street in operating its road as a mere license or privilege enjoyable during the life of the corporation and revocable at the will of the state is not only repugnant to justice and reason, but contrary to the uniform course of authority in the United States. People v. O'Brien, 111 N. Y. 1, 2 L. R. A. 255, 18 N. E. 692.

In Tennessee the right possessed by a street railway in the city streets is properly regarded as an easement and, for the purposes of taxation, real estate. South Nashville Street R. Co. v. Morrow, 87 Tenn. 406, 2 L. R. A. 853, 11 S. W. 348.

In Illinois and Michigan a franchise is taxable as personal property. Belleville Nail Co. v. People, 98 Ill. 399; Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Detroit, 125 Mich. 673, 85 N. W. 96, 86 N. W. 809.

Under a Texas general law (Laws 1874, p. 214) wharf privileges are taxable separately as a distinct property from the real and personal property with which the wharfers' 67 L. R. A.

business is carried on. Galveston Co. v. Galveston Wharf Co. 72 Tex. 557, 10 S. W. 587.

A franchise once granted cannot be destroyed, taken from the grantee, or impaired by the arbitrary act of the public authorities in refusing a necessary means to its exercise. People ex rel. Woodhaven Gaslight Co. v. Deehan, 153 N. Y. 528, 47 N. E. 787.

It cannot be taken away or abridged by statute without compensation. Coney Island, Ft. H. & B. R. Co. v. Kennedy, 15 App. Div. 588, 48 N. Y. Supp. 525.

Even for public use. Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Reid, 13 Wall. 264, 20 L. ed. 568, Reversing 64 N. C. 226.

And, equally with rolling stock and real estate, is it within the protection of a charter exemption of the corporate property. Ibid.

But it is not liable to seizure and sale. Stein v. Mobile, 17 Ala. 234.

This is otherwise in New York as to certain franchises, such, for instance, as the right of a street railway company to use a street. That is a property right which survives the dissolution of the company and passes to its lawful grantees. The laws of that state have made such franchises taxable, inheritable, alienable, subject to levy and sale under execution, to condemnation under the right of eminent domain, and invested them with the attributes of property generally. People v. O'Brien, 111 N. Y. 1, 2 L. R. A. 255, 18 N. E. 692.

V. Taxability of franchises.

a. When taxable.

In general corporate franchises are taxable. Edison Electric Illum. Co. v. Spokane County, 22 Wash. 168, 60 Pac. 132.

As much so as any other property. New Orleans v. New Orleans City & L. R. Co. 40 La. Ann. 587, 4 So. 512; Affirmed in 143 U. S. 192, 36 L. ed. 121, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 406, Followed in New Orleans v. Orleans R. Co. 42 La. Ann. 4, 7 So. 59.

The franchise to be and continue, with the accompanying powers given by a state to a domestic corporation, being valuable, are taxable according to the amount of the value thus conferred and continued. Southern Gum Co. v. Laylin (Ohio) 64 N. E. 564.

Corporate franchises are taxable under a statute requiring all property in the state not exempt to be taxed. Fond du Lac Water Co. v. Fond du Lac, 82 Wis. 322, 16 L. R. A. 581, 52 N. W. 439.

And notwithstanding no method of ascertaining their value or levying the tax thereon varieties of corporation and company, followed by the words, "and every other like company, corporation, or association." It then provides, "also every other corporation, company, or association having or exercising any special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons, or performing any public service." It seems obvious that some varieties of corporations were intended to be excluded from the operation of this act; for why should this painstaking particularity of enumeration have been used, if the object was to include all incorporated companies, which would be the effect of the law if appellee's contention be sustained,—that the exemption of private property from corporate debts is a privilege to the corporation? The latter clause, "also every other corporation, company, or association having or exercising any special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons, or performing any public service," seems to us to have been added for the purpose of including such corporations as were not strictly ejusdem generis with the companies previously enumerated, but which might possess exclusive privileges, and, as a provision for the future, to impose the intangible property tax upon corporations to be hereafter created, which might have exclusive privileges or perform public services. The only authority relied on in support of the contention that this language includes all corporations is the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Norman, 77 Fed. 27. But the case was in relation to a company specifically named in the statute under consideration. The question here presented did not arise in that case, and was,

has been prescribed by the legislature. State ex rel. Milwaukee Street R. Co. v. Anderson, 90 Wis. 550, 63 N. W. 746.

A statute providing that personal property, for the purposes of taxation, shall include various designated kinds, none of such intangible character as franchises and "all other personal property not here enumerated" and not exempt, is sufficient warrant for taxing the franchises of a street railway corporation. They do not escape under the rule of ejusdem generis. Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Detroit, 125 Mich. 673, 85 N. W. 96, 86 N. W. 809.

The franchises of a water company to exist as a corporation and do business in a corporate capacity, to condemn by right of eminent domain lands and waters, to use and occupy city streets with mains and conduits and sell water to public and private consumers, are taxable as property in a state whose constitution provides that all property therein not exempt by United States laws shall be taxed ad valorem as provided by law, and that the term "property" includes, inter alia, franchises, notwithstanding the corporate possessor is organized under a general law the privileges of which are open to all citizens upon the same terms, and its chartered powers are subject to alteration, restriction, or repeal at the will of the legislature. Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69.

The temporary suspension, though continued for six months, of a savings bank because of insolvency, followed by a resumption of business after compromising with its depositors, does not relieve the bank from its liability to pay a state franchise tax accruing just before it resumed business and measured by the average amount of its deposits as scaled for the prior six months of suspension. The franchise remained alive and the bank was not prevented by injunction from using it. State v. Waterville Sav. Bank, 68 Me. 515.

And although a savings bank is to some extent temporarily enjoined from doing business, and afterwards the temporary injunction is made permanent so that business is never resumed, a franchise tax measured by the average deposits of the preceding half year, assessed before the permanent injunction issued, must still be paid. Com. v. Barnstable Sav. Bank, 126 Mass. 526. But see infra, V. b. 2.

The fact that a statute for the taxation of special franchises was amended in its progress through the legislature by striking out the word "across" from the definition of railroad franchises intended to be taxed thereunder, which originally read all franchises, rights, or 57 L. R. A.

permission to construct, maintain, or operate the same in, under, above, on, across or through streets, highways, or public places, does not show that the legislature intended highway crossings to be free from taxation under the act. New York, L. & W. R. Co. v. Roll, 32 Misc. 321, 66 N. Y. Supp. 748.

The power to tax persons and corporations using franchises is not confined to the legislature, but, regarding franchises as property, authority may lawfully be conferred upon a municipality to tax them to the extent that they have an existence within the municipal limits in the light of a constitutional mandate to the legislature to require that all taxable property within the limits of municipal corporations be taxed. Huck v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 86 Ill. 352.

And a municipality authorized by statute to raise money by taxes for its own use has a right to lay a franchise tax on a bank located and doing a banking business within its limits, chartered by act of Congress, provided it is not a national bank or one for collecting, safe keeping, and transmitting the national revenues. Farmers' Bank v. Fox, 4 Cranch, C. C. 330, Fed. Cas. No. 4,658.

b. When not taxable.

1. Generally.

It is not the rule everywhere, as in Michigan, Wisconsin, and some other states (vide supra, V. a), that a general law requiring all real and personal property to be taxed requires or authorizes the taxation of corporate franchises. It is exactly the reverse in New Jersey. State, Passaic Water Co., Prosecutor, v. Paterson, 56 N. J. L. 471, 29 Atl. 185. The statute sub judice in that case (Act 1866, § 2, Rev. 1150) provided that all real and personal estate, whether owned by individuals or corporations, should be liable to taxation. And the court held that it was designed to reach only those species of property usually owned by both corporations and individuals, and thus included, neither mere franchisees, on the one hand, which individuals cannot own, nor offices, upon the other, which corporations cannot hold.

In harmony with the New Jersey case just cited, are Borel v. New York, 2 Sandf. 552, and notably the late case of State v. Austin & N. W. R. Co. 94 Tex. 530, 62 S. W. 1050.

When the taxing statutes do not include corporate franchisees among the subjects of taxation a tax thereon is void. Alexandria Canal, R. & Bridge Co. v. District of Columbia, 5 Mackey, 378.

presumably, not argued; and the suggestion made by the learned judge who delivered that opinion was made in argument, in reaching a conclusion to reach which the dictum cited was not necessary. While we attach little importance to legislative debate or legislative action, in the amendment or alteration of bills while on their passage, as a means of ascertaining the proper construction of the act adopted, it is interesting to note that this bill, as originally introduced, provided for the taxation of "every corporation organized under the laws of this state, or any other state, for the purpose of profit or doing business," with the exception of certain enumerated foreign corporations. It further appears, from an examination of §§ 4227, 4228, 4231, and 4232, that § 4077 could not have been intended to apply to all corporations; for these sections provide for the taxation of foreign life insurance companies, foreign building and loan associations, foreign insurance companies other than life, and foreign assessment companies. The conclusion reached is strengthened when we consider the contemporaneous practical construction of the statute by the officers required by law to enforce it. Barbour v. Louisville, 83 Ky. 102; Harrison v. Com. 83 Ky. 162.

It has been suggested that to hold that this statute does not apply to all corporations would render the act unconstitutional, as in violation of § 171, which requires the taxes to be uniform upon all property subject to taxation within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax. But we cannot concur in this contention. The revenue law of the state is not unconstitutional because it does not require natural persons, possess-

And when in such case the assessment is upon the property and franchise of a corporation as a unit, and it is impossible to determine how much of it is laid on the property and how much upon the franchise, the whole tax is void. Ibid.

In Tennessee corporate franchisees are property subject to taxation in connection with tangible property, but not separately. South Nashville Street R. Co. v. Morrow, 87 Tenn. 406, 2 L. R. A. 853, 11 S. W. 348.

To warrant the imposition of a tax upon a corporate franchise there must be a statute evincing the legislative intent to make it subject to taxation. Covington Gaslight Co. v. Covington, 92 Ky. 312, 17 S. W. 808.

Under an act for the taxation of the privileges and franchisees granted by the legislature to savings banks as personal property to an amount not exceeding the gross sum of their surplus earned (after deducting the amount of such surplus invested in United States securities), a savings bank having uninvested cash on deposit is not taxable when its investments in United States bonds exceed its entire surplus. People ex rel. Ithaca Sav. Bank v. Beers, 67 How. Pr. 219.

2. By the state.

When by a decree of sequestration the charter of a savings bank expires, its franchise is dead, and a state franchise tax thereafter accruing, though measured by the average deposits during the prior six months, during part of which period such franchise existed, fails. Jones v. Winthrop Sav. Bank, 66 Me. 242.

(N. B.:—Observe the distinction between this case and those of State v. Waterville Sav. Bank, 68 Me. 515; and Com. v. Barnstable Sav. Bank, 126 Mass. 526, supra, V. a.)

Prior to the act of March, 1890, corporate franchisees were not subject to taxation for state purposes in Kentucky. Bourbon Stock Yard Co. v. Clark, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 926.

When the statutes do not authorize the taxation of corporate franchisees, as in Illinois they do not when these belong to a foreign corporation, it is not permissible to tax them as a penalty for failure to make return, as required by statute, of the capital stock and franchisees of a domestic corporation whose entire plant the foreign one has leased and operates. Postal Tele. Cable Co. v. Barnard, 87 Ill. App. 105.

While it is true that all corporate franchisees are the subject of legislative, and not of municipal, grant, the limitation contained in the 57 L. R. A.

New Jersey statute of 1900 (P. L. 1900, chap. 195, p. 502), imposing a franchise tax upon sundry corporations, forbidding its application to any corporation which before it was enacted did not, or which thereafter shall not, exercise any municipal franchise, does not render the whole act nugatory if given effect, since the purpose of the limitation, and its effect, are merely to exclude from the scope of the act such corporations as do not hold franchises dependent for their exercise and enjoyment upon municipal consent, and to tax all others that do so depend. State ex rel. State Bd. of Assessors v. Plainfield Water Supply Co. (N. J. L.) 52 Atl. 230.

The declaration in such act that it shall not be construed to apply to any corporation which has not theretofore, or may not thereafter, exercise any municipal franchise, is not void as a legislative attempt to control the judicial function of interpreting statutes, since it is only a limitation on the scope of the act itself, and equivalent to a mere declaration that the law shall not apply to such corporations. Ibid.

In Texas, under statutes requiring railroads to list for taxation all their real and personal property, giving the number of miles of roadbed in the counties where situated at the full and true value thereof; to deliver annually to each local assessor, wherever the road runs, a sworn classified statement or list of all real estate and the value thereof owned or possessed exclusive of right of way and depot grounds, the length of the road and its value per mile, including roadbed, right of way, superstructure, depots, and station grounds, and all shops and fixtures used in operating, and all personal property except rolling stock, describing it in the same manner as citizens are required to describe theirs; and providing that real property includes land and the structures thereon and all rights and privileges appertaining thereto with mines, minerals, quarries, and fossils in and under it; and in the absence of any statute taxing intangible railroad property or providing any method for valuing it, while individuals are required to list their franchisees,—an assessment on the intangible personal property of a railroad, consisting of its rights, privileges, immunities, contracts, goodwill, and franchise to do and carry on business as a common carrier of passengers and freight for hire, as a separate taxable entity, en bloc, is invalid. State v. Austin & N. W. R. Co. 94 Tex. 530, 62 S. W. 1050.

8. Locally.

One must keep in mind the fundamental dif-

ing no special franchise or privilege, to make report of special privileges and franchises for taxation; nor is it unconstitutional in failing to require a report for the purpose of a franchise or intangible property tax from those corporations which have no special or exclusive franchise, and cannot, as matter of law, possess intangible property. The law requires a report from all classes of corporations which can possess the intangible property sought to be taxed by this statute. The tax upon tangible property of all corporations is elsewhere provided for.

There remains but one question for consideration, and that is whether this company comes within the section, under the words "or performing any public service." It has been repeatedly held by this court, in passing upon exemptions from taxation, that the test to determine whether an institution performs a public service is whether there exists the right to levy a tax upon the public in aid of the institution. Barbour v. Louisville Bd. of Trade, 82 Ky. 653; Lancaster v. Clayton, 86 Ky. 373, 5 S. W. 864; Clark v. Louisville Water Co. 90 Ky. 515, 14 S. W. 502; Com. v. Makibben, 90 Ky. 384, 14 S. W. 372. Nor do we think, under the case of Nash v. Page, 80 Ky. 539, 44 Am. Rep. 490, following the case of Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77, that property becomes clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence, and to affect the community at large. "When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good, to the extent of the interest he ference between state and local power to tax. The sovereign state may tax ad libitum except when restrained by written constitution. A subordinate governmental body is a creature of delegated powers and can tax only when expressly authorized so to do.

The case last cited (State v. Austin & N. W. R. Co. 94 Tex. 530, 62 S. W. 1050) was followed in Dallas Consol. Electric Street R. Co. v. Dallas (Tex. Civ. App.) 65 S. W. 201, where a city tax, assessed separately on a "franchise to operate and maintain lines of street railway" on certain streets, was held invalid because such franchise was part of the real estate.

A municipal ordinance forbidding any one to engage in the telephone business, or to place in or to occupy with poles and wires any of the streets without paying an annual fee of $100 for a license to do so, is a revenue measure and not a regulation, because the sum charged is not limited to the expense of issuing the license and policing. And when the act of the legislature incorporating the city thus ordaining merely empowers it to license, regulate, or prohibit telegraph and telephone companies using the roads, streets, or alleys, and fix the compensation to be paid annually for the privilege or license, an ordinance for revenue is invalid. Sunset Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Medford, 115 Fed. 202.

While the above case held, in terms, the foregoing proposition, it also decided that a municipal franchise granted on terms to a telephone company to set up poles and string wires in the streets could not be burdened with new conditions such as the ordinance in question imposed, after the company had accepted and complied with the terms, and established its plant, a proposition less debatable. Ibid.

A street railroad company having a franchise to lay rails and run cars in a borough street is not subject to an assessment for paving such street on the ground that the value of its franchise has been enhanced thereby, when the only power the borough has to lay such an assessment is limited to imposing it upon lands and buildings benefited by the improvement; and this is so, notwithstanding such railroad was bound by its charter to keep such street in repair, and had neglected to do so, and repaving was necessary in consequence. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Ansonia, 61 Conn. 76, 23 Atl. 705.

While corporate franchises are taxable property, they cannot be subjected to municipal taxation for local purposes without express statutory authority; and general acts providing that all real and personal estate, whether owned by individuals or corporations, shall be liable for taxes; and that the real and personal estate of every corporation shall be taxed the same as that of individuals,—are insufficient for the purpose. State, Passaic Water Co., Prosecutor, v. Paterson, 56 N. J. L. 471, 29 Atl. 185.

Inasmuch as the acts of Congress empowering the municipal authorities of Washington, District of Columbia, to impose taxes, do not authorize the taxation of a corporate franchise, an assessment on the piers, trunk, bridge, and structures to low-water mark, Virginia shore, with the franchise, laid upon a corporation owning a combined bridge, aqueduct, and canal across the Potomac river under franchises from Virginia, Maryland, and Congress, is invalid. Alexandria Canal, R. & Bridge Co. v. District of Columbia, 5 Mackey, 376.

A provision in a city charter authorizing the assessing and collecting of taxes on real estate in the city, and on such personal estate, shares in associations, and moneys within the city, or belonging to the inhabitants thereof, as the city council may designate, and such as are, and from time to time may be, taxable by the laws of the state, does not authorize a municipal tax upon the franchise of a corporation when the state has not made it taxable. Covington Gaslight Co. v. Covington, 92 Ky. 312, 17 S. W. 808.

A right granted by a municipality to an individual to erect on the water front a wharf and collect fees from vessels mooring thereat to take on or discharge cargoes, without title to the soil, although a valuable franchise, is not subject to separate assessment for taxation and sale for nonpayment thereof, because it is not within the statutory definitions of either real or personal property as defined by the tax laws. Boreel v. New York, 2 Sandf. 552.

In the statutory scheme, long in vogue in New York, for the local taxation of corporations generally the subject of the tax has been the capital stock, surplus profits, or reserve funds, exceeding 10 per cent of the capital, less the assessed value of the real estate and shares of stock in other corporations subject to like taxation. It was long the uniform practice of the local assessors throughout the state to fix the valuation of the capital stock by the aggregate market value of the shares. But the court of appeals finally held this erroneous, and declared the capital stock taxable under this system to be the capital existing in money or property or both, and not to embrace surplus, franchise, dividend,—earning power, nor goodwill, and hence not ascertainable from the value of the share stock, which has thus created. He may withdraw his grant by discontinuing the use, but so long as he maintains the use he must submit to the control." This is very far from holding that a tobacco warehouseman performs a public service. It was there held that an analogy existed between the business of a warehouseman and that of a common carrier, in this: that as the owner of a stage cannot, without excuse, decline to take a passenger, so a warehouseman is bound to allow all tobacco buyers to bid for tobacco on reasonable terms at his warehouse, and cannot evade this responsibility by calling himself a commission merchant while continuing the business of warehouseman. And it is manifest that the business of warehouseman is as much affected by the public interest when conducted by a natural person as by a corporation, and it is not contended that the law was intended to apply to tobacco warehouses operated by natural persons.

For the reasons indicated, a rehearing is granted, the former opinion is withdrawn, the judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to award appellant a new trial, and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Guffy, Paynter, and White, JJ., dissent.

Hobson, J., concurring:

In this case the whole court is agreed that the indictment against appellant should be dismissed, but it has become necessary for the guidance of the executive officers of the state that the court should construe § 4077 of the Kentucky Statutes, re-includes all these things and is a wholly different, not an identical or equivalent, thing. People ex rel. Union Trust Co. v. Coleman, 126 N. Y. 433, 12 L. R. A. 762, 27 N. E. 818.

That case worked a revolution in the assessment of corporations for local taxation. Since that decision it has been uniformly held that franchises in general are not subject to local taxation in New York. People ex rel. Manhattan R. Co. v. Barker, 146 N. Y. 304, 40 N. E. 998, Reversing 48 App. Div. 248, 63 N. Y. Supp. 167, and Affirming 28 Misc. 13, 59 N. Y. Supp. 926, 152 N. Y. 417, 46 N. E. 875; *People ex rel. Keystone Gas Co. v. So that it could be, and was, said that the law of New York is well settled as to what is the subject of assessment and how the value is to be ascertained for the purpose of taxing a corporation by local taxing officers. 1. The capital stock of every corporation liable to taxation must be assessed at its actual value. 2. It is the value, not of the capital stock, 4. e., the aggregate shares, but of the capital, i. e., the money and property, that is to be ascertained. 3. To ascertain this requires the valuing of the whole property of the corporation, real or personal or both; and from the aggregate is to be deducted the assessed value of the real estate, and the balance, less debts and exemptions allowed by law, is the capital subject to assessment and taxation. 4. The corporate franchises are no part of the assessable capital. People ex rel. Consolidated Teleg. & E. Subway Co. v. Barker, 7 App. Div. 27, 39 N. Y. Supp. 776.

This particular branch of the subject is treated in full in the complementary note to the taxation of the capital stock of corporations in the United States.

c. Exemptions.

Whenever an exemption of a corporation from a franchise tax depends upon, or is laid claim to by virtue of, a provision in its charter or in the charter of its predecessor, or a statute of the state amounting to a contract, the case falls without the purview of this note, and is considered where the topic is comprehensively treated in a separate note on corporate taxation 57 L. R. A.

tion as affected by the contract clause in the United States Constitution. The exemptions here considered are of a different character.

A domestic corporation liable in its home state to pay a tax upon its franchise according to the amount of its capital stock found to be employed within such state, which, notwithstanding it designated in its certificate of incorporation a place within the state where its principal place of business was to be and its operations carried on, actually removes its office to another state, and thereafter makes no sales, manufactures nothing, occupies no premises, pays no rent, employs no help, and does no business in the state of its origin, is exempt from such tax, because it employs no capital stock within the state. People Davis-Colby Ore Roaster Co. v. Campbell, 66 Hun, 146, 21 N. Y. Supp. 7.

A domestic corporation owning vessels plying between different ports upon the great lakes, engaged wholly in interstate commerce and making no trips between any two ports in New York, which receive or ship at one port in that state about three fourths of all their cargoes, but make less than 2 per cent of their mileage therein, does not employ its capital stock in that state so as to be liable for the annual tax imposed upon corporations of one fourth of a mill upon each dollar of capital stock for each 1 per cent of dividends made or declared during the year, within § 182 of the New York tax law making the basis of computation the capital stock employed within the state. People ex rel. Lackawanna Transp. Co. v. Knight, 77 N. Y. Supp. 398.

So much of the capital stock of a domestic railroad corporation as is invested in freight cars permanently engaged without the state is not employed therein, and so not a basis for a franchise tax measured by the capital stock employed in the state. People v. Campbell, 88 Hun, 544, 34 N. Y. Supp. 801.

And coal and supplies owned by a domestic railroad corporation, which remain without the state, are likewise no part of the capital stock employed by it within the state as a basis for computing such franchise tax. People ex rel. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Knight, 77 N. Y. Supp. 401.

Neither are dividends which it expects to receive from stocks which it owns in other corporations. Ibid.

So, too, of capital stock invested by a domestic corporation in idle swamp lands not in any way used by it. People ex rel. Niagara River Hydraulic Co. v. Roberts, 30 App. Div. 180, 51 N. Y. Supp. 771.

But stocks held in other corporations by a lating to tax on franchises. The proper construction of this statute presents a question of great difficulty, on which the members of the court have been unable to agree; and it must be determined, in order that persons interested may know how to conduct their business. The statute reads as follows: "Every railway company or corporation and every incorporated bank, trust company, guarantee or security company, gas company, water company, ferry company, bridge company, street railway company, express company, electric light company, electric power company, telegraph company, press despatch company, telephone company, turnpike company, palace-car company, dining-car company, sleeping-car company, chair-car company, and every other like company, corporation, or association, also every other corporation, company, or association, having or exercising any special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons, or performing any public service, shall, in addition to the other taxes imposed on it by law, annually pay a tax on its franchise to the state, and a local tax thereon to the county, incorporated city, town, and taxing district, where its franchise may be exercised." It is insisted that this statute applies to all corporations. It is said that the right of corporate existence is a franchise, and that the exemption of the stockholders from liability for corporate debts is also a franchise, and so that all corporations are included in the section. There would be more force in this argument if the statute read, "any franchise," but it reads, "any special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural personal railroad must be regarded as a part of its capital stock employed within the state, and a factor in computing such tax. People ex rel. New York C. & H. E. R. Co. v. Knight, 77 N. Y. Supp. 401.

A railroad cannot avoid a tax upon its right to cross a highway, taxable as a special franchise, upon the ground that it is an easement in land derived from the owner of the fee, and not a privilege granted by the public. New York, L. & W. R. Co. v. Roll, 32 Misc. 321, 66 N. Y. Supp. 748.

Nevertheless it is also held that the New York tax law, as amended by chap. 712, Laws 1899, in defining as taxable property "a franchise, right, authority, or permission" to lay pipes or mains in or under a public street, means only some special privilege granted by a governmental body having authority to confer it; that such a permission granted by private individuals owning the fee is no franchise, and hence is not taxable. People ex rel. Betsol M'n. Co. v. Priest, 77 N. Y. Supp. 382. To the like effect is the Park Tax Case, 84 Md. 1, sub nom. Baltimore v. Baltimore, C. & E. M. Pass. R. Co. 33 L. R. A. 503, 35 Atl. 17.

A statute requiring every domestic trust company to pay annually, for the privilege of exercising its corporate franchises or carrying on its business in an organized capacity, a yearly tax equal to 1 per cent on the amount of its capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits, and providing that such trust companies shall be exempt from assessment and taxation for all other purposes, is not a statute of exemption purely, but one that substitutes one method of taxation for another. Hence, the rule requiring exemption statutes to be strictly construed does not apply. Binghamton Trust Co. v. Binghamton, 72 App. Div. 341, 76 N. Y. Supp. 517.

Under a general statute declaring that taxes shall be levied upon all the property in the state except such as is exempted; and, in the absence of any law exempting corporate franchises, beyond those of railroads, and in the existence of several acts providing that railroad exemptions should not apply to lines operated by horse, cable, or electric power,—the franchisees of an electric street-railway corporation, whether to exist or to operate, are liable to assessment and taxation as property. State ex rel. Milwaukee Street R. Co. v. Anderson, 90 Wis. 550, 63 N. W. 746.

Many states have statutes exempting manufacturing corporations from taxation. The cases generally arising under such laws lie outside the scope of this note. Those alone wherein the direct question of liability for a franchise tax has been passed upon are included.

A manufacturing corporation which, though regularly organized, and preserving its organization by observance of the legal requirements, has not yet begun actual operations anywhere because under injunction against using patents upon which its proposed productions depend, is not subject to a tax upon its franchise when a statute exempts therefrom manufacturing companies carrying on business in the state. Re Faure Electric Light & Force Co. 43 N. J. Eq. 411, 5 Atl. 817.

An Illinois corporation formed according to the terms of its charter for the purpose of furnishing light, heat, and power for public and private uses is not organized for purely manufacturing purposes within the statute of that state (Rev. Stat., chap. 120, § 3, cl. 4), so as to be exempt from assessment by the state board of equalization upon its capital stock and franchises, and liable alone to assessment upon its property by the local assessors the same as individual owners notwithstanding it actually generates the electricity it uses. Evanston Electric Illuminating Co. v. Kochersperger, 175 Ill. 26, 51 N. E. 719. The court based its decision upon the ground that the phrasing of the charter was conclusive. The case hardly goes so far as to decide that electric light and power companies are not manufacturing corporations. And it is probably not a precedent when that point shall arise under a charter couched in terms more happily chosen.

The New York cases in point hold otherwise.

A domestic corporation organized under a general act for the formation of corporations for manufacturing and other purposes, and engaged in the business of producing electricity and supplying it to customers for the purpose of private and public illumination, is a manufacturing corporation, and as such was not subject to taxation upon its corporate franchise or business under a statute providing for such a tax upon corporations generally, with certain exceptions, among which were manufacturing corporations, and did not become so subject until, by an amendment to the tax law, electric light companies were by name taken out of the exception, although in the meantime the state officials had uniformly insisted that they were never included. People ex rel. Brush Electric Mfg. Co. v. Wemple, 129 N. Y. 543, 14 L. R. A. 708, 29 N. E. 808.

And to the like effect is People ex rel. Edison Electric Illum. Co. v. Wemple, 129 N. Y. 684, 29 N. E. 812, where the relator was engaged in the same business, but organized under an act for the formation of gas companies.

sons;" and this special or exclusive franchise may be taxed in any county, city, town, or taxing district where it may be exercised. The same legislature that passed this act passed a statute allowing everybody to form corporations for certain business purposes, and the right of corporate existence enjoyed by these corporations is in no sense a special or exclusive franchise not allowed by law to natural persons. In Morawetz on Private Corporations (§ 923) the accurate author says: "All persons have now the right of forming corporate associations upon complying with the simple formalities prescribed by statute. The right of forming a corporation and of acting in a corporate capacity under the general incorporation laws can be called a 'franchise' only in the sense in which the right of forming a limited partnership, or of executing a conveyance of land by deed, is a franchise." The same rule is laid down in Thomp. Corp. § 5335. In § 5336 this author also says: "The franchise of being a corporation vests in the individuals who compose the corporation, while those secondary franchises, which we shall hereafter see are vendible by the corporation, necessarily, and for the same reason alone, must be deemed to vest in the corporation." The right of corporate existence, not vesting in the corporation, does not pass under a sale by it of all its property and franchises. Smith v. Gover, 2 Duv. 19; Thomp. Corp. § 5354; Coe v. Columbus, P. & I. R. Co. 10 Ohio St. 372, 75 Am. Dec. 518; Metz v. Buffalo, C. & P. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 61, 17 Am. Rep. 201; Fietsam v. Hay, 122 Ill. 293, 13 N. E. 501. That which does not pass under a grant of all the corporate property and

A foreign corporation, however, organized under the laws of its home state to manufacture, buy, sell, lease, or otherwise procure, own, and dispose of electric and electric telegraph and telephone instruments and apparatus of all kinds, and all parts of the same, and to acquire by purchase, patent, and other rights and franchises, and acquire and dispose of, capital stock of other corporations, which, although it has its main office and factory in the state of its domicile, yet conducts an extensive manufacturing and general business according to its chartered powers in the state of New York, is neither wholly engaged in manufacturing, because of its broader charter powers, nor is it wholly engaged in manufacture within the state of New York, so as to be exempt under a statute thereof from taxation upon the corporate franchise or business of domestic and foreign corporations doing business in such state, except those wholly engaged in carrying on manufacture therein. People ex rel. Western Electric Co. v. Campbell, 145 N. Y. 587, 40 N. E. 239, Affirming 80 Hun, 466, 30 N. Y. Supp. 472.

There are some Pennsylvania cases arising under a statute of that state for the taxation of capital stock including franchises from which manufacturing companies are exempt holding that electric light and power companies are not within the exemption. But these decisions go upon the theory, not that such concerns are not manufacturers, but that, their art and product being wholly unknown when the statute was enacted; and there being in existence manufacturing companies to which the statute could and did apply,—the exemption must be held to cover no other manufacturing than what was then within the known and understood popular sense of the word. Com. v. Northern Electric Light & P. Co. 145 Pa. 105, 14 L. R. A. 107, 22 Atl. 839; Com. v. Edison Electric Light Co. 145 Pa. 131, 22 Atl. 841; Com. v. Brush Electric Light Co. 145 Pa. 147, 22 Atl. 844.

A corporation organized under a special law (a general manufacturing act being extant) for the purpose of building, using, and providing one or more dry or wet docks or other conveniences and structures for building, raising, repairing, and coppering vessels of every description is not a manufacturing corporation within the statutory exemption of such from taxes upon franchises or business. People v. New York Floating Dry Dock Co. 92 N. Y. 487.

Neither is a corporation engaged in harvesting, collecting, storing, preserving, and preparing ice for sale, and transporting it to market, and there vending it to purchasers, 57 L. R. A.

notwithstanding it is organized under a supplemental statute to the general manufacturing act passed for the very purpose of extending the same to such corporations. People v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 99 N. Y. 181, 1 N. E. 669.

A foreign corporation engaged in and organized for mining, reducing, smelting, and refining ores and incidental operations, and others more or less remotely connected therewith in the state of its origin and other states, which merely receives in New York silver bullion, and there has it refined by the United States assay office into standard silver bars, paying the usual percentage compensation for the work and certification and then selling the bars and certificates and using the proceeds in its business as needed both within and without the state, is not a manufacturing corporation carrying on manufacture within New York state, so as to be exempt from the franchise or business tax imposed by the laws thereof upon corporations, not manufacturing ones, so engaged. People v. Horn Silver Min. Co. 105 N. Y. 76, 11 N. E. 155, Affirming 38 Hun, 276, and Affirmed in 143 U. S. 305, 36 L. ed. 104, 4 Intern. Com. Rep. 57, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403.

The mere fact that a domestic manufacturing corporation having only power by its charter to make and sell its own wares does, ultra vires, employ part of its capital in buying and selling similar wares of other makers in connection with its own stock, and does so without the state and in foreign countries, does not deprive it of the exemption given to corporations "wholly engaged in manufacture within the state," and no others, in a statute providing for the taxing of corporations upon their corporate franchise or business. People ex rel. Tiffany & Co. v. Campbell, 144 N. Y. 166, 38 N. E. 990, Affirming 80 Hun, 95, 30 N. Y. Supp. 70.

While the right of a manufacturing company to sell its wares, and at retail, if it so chooses, is incidental to the power to manufacture, and therefore implied in its charter and the general statutes of the state relating to such companies, and their rights, privileges, and immunities, the right to add thereto and sell the wares of other makers of the same kind of goods to complete lines of stock and meet the demands of customers is not incidental, and hence not embraced; therefore, a corporation is not taxable so far as it makes and sells its own wares, and is taxable so far as it deals in those of others, under a statute for taxing the franchise or business of corporations except when wholly engaged in manufacturing within the state. Ibid.

franchise is certainly not a franchise of the corporation for taxing purposes, under our Constitution, providing for the taxation of all property of the citizen not by it exempted. It is equally clear that the exemption of the individual property of the stockholders from corporate debts is not a franchise of the corporation, but vests in the stockholders. It is not a special or exclusive privilege not allowed by law to natural persons, for all persons may be stockholders in corporations. The privilege is open to all who may wish to take advantage of the statute. The concluding words of the sentence providing for the payment of a local tax on the franchise to the county, city, town, and taxing district where it may be exercised cannot refer to the exemption of the individual property of the stockholder from corporate debts; for these words plainly refer to rights exercised by the corporation, such as the collection of tolls, the taking of private property under the right of eminent domain, and the like. If they refer to the exemption of the stockholder's individual property from corporate debts, then it would follow that a local tax under this statute could be imposed in every county or locality where it was exercised; that is, where any stockholder enjoyed the exemption, which might be in any part of the state. The object of the statute is to get at the property of the corporation for the purposes of taxation. It refers by the term "privilege or franchise," to rights possessed by the corporation which are valuable as property, and so should be assessed for taxation. The right of the stockholder to exemption from liability for the debts of the corporation above the amount specified by

But a corporation, although organized under the general manufacturing act, which is chartered to print, publish, and sell books, pictures, newspapers, objects of art and ornament, and to do any and all business connected with or appertaining to a general printing, publishing, and book-selling business, and which, as part of its regular trade, buys, and sells foreign books that it does not make, is not exempt from such franchise tax, even to the extent that its capital is employed in making and vending its own wares. People ex rel. Frederick A. Stokes Co. v. Roberts, 90 Hun, 533, 38 N. Y. Supp. 73.

And a domestic manufacturing company which has its factories, and does all its manufacturing, in a foreign state, although all the rest of its business is done in the home state, is not exempt from such franchise tax. People ex rel. Blackinton Co. v. Roberts, 4 App. Div. 388, 38 N. Y. Supp. 872.

Neither is a corporation which slaughters cattle and makes the meat ready for market in another state, simply refrigerating and vending it in New York. People ex rel. Schwarzschild & S. Co. v. Roberts, 11 App. Div. 449, 42 N. Y. Supp. 317.

In fact the slaughtering, chilling, and preparing for consumption, and keeping fit for food, animals, is not manufacturing, and therefore not exempt. People ex rel. New England Dressed Meat & Wool Co. v. Roberts, 155 N. Y. 408, 41 L. R. A. 228, 50 N. E. 53, Reversing 20 App. Div. 521, 47 N. Y. Supp. 123.

But it is otherwise of the business of producing kindling wood by machinery by cutting green slabs, kiln drying and bundling the sticks. A corporation so engaged is a manufacturing one, and its capital therein invested, as well as its office equipment, is exempt from the franchise tax. People ex rel. Standard Wood Co. v. Roberts, 20 App. Div. 514, 47 N. Y. Supp. 122.

Granting that the printing and publication of a newspaper is manufacturing, a corporation which publishes one, but lets out by contract the type-setting and printing thereof, is not engaged in manufacturing so as to entitle it to exemption from such franchise tax. People ex rel. Jewelers' Circular Pub. Co. v. Roberts, 155 N. Y. 1, 49 N. E. 248.

And if a manufacturing corporation is engaged as well in foreign or interstate commerce it is not wholly engaged in manufacturing within the state, and so is exempt from no part of such franchise tax. People ex rel. William J. Matheson & Co. v. Roberts, 158 N. Y. 162, 52 N. E. 1102, Affirming 27 App. Div. 632, 50 N. Y. Supp. 1132; People ex rel. American Soda-Fountain Co. v. Roberts, 158 N. Y. 168, 57 L. R. d. Property exempt as part of franchise.

This branch of the topic is referred to, rather than treated, here, as it properly appertains to the taxation of corporate property, tangible and intangible, which is the subject of a separate note. In so far as such exemptions, or the claims to them, rest upon charter provisions or other contracts between states and corporations, they are considered in a note upon corporate taxation as affected by the contract clause in the Federal Constitution. In addition, the reader should consult the note to the case of Yellow River Improv. Co. v. Wood County (Wis.) 17 L. R. A. 92, for a view of the law on this point prior to 1892.

It is only when a statute or state policy prevails in a given jurisdiction that property necessary for the construction and operation of the corporate works and the exercise of the franchise is exempt from taxation; hence the immunity prevailing in some states does not exist in others, where the legislature has not granted it. Orange & A. R. Co. v. Alexandria, 17 Gratt. 176.

When such a statute or state policy does prevail it is the general rule that only such corporate property as is in actual use in the corporate operations, and is confined to such use, and is actually necessary, not to say indispensable, to the exercise of the corporate franchises, is exempt as a part of those franchises, and not liable to separate assessment and taxation. McCulloch v. Stone, 64 Miss. 378, 8 So. 236; Augusta v. Central R. Co. 78 Ga. 119; State, Pennsylvania R. Co., Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 49 N. J. L. 540, 60 Am. Rep. 648, 9 Atl. 782; Northumberland Co. v. Philadelphia & E. R. Co. (Pa.) 8 Cent. Rep. 531, 9 Atl. 504; Ford v. Delta & P. Land Co. 43 Fed. 181; Fargo & S. W. R. Co. v. Brewer, 3 N. D. 34, 53 N. W. 177; State, Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., Prosecutor, v. Fuller, 40 N. J. L. 329; Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Reid, 13 Wall. 284, 20 L. ed. 568, Reversing 64 N. C. 226; Pennsylvania & N. Y. Canal & R. Co. v. Vanddyke, 137 Pa. 249, 20 Atl. 653.

In Pennsylvania it has been said that the rule that measures the extent of the exemption from local taxation of the property of a water company supplying the public is to be construed liberally in favor of the company. Spring Brook Water Supply Co. v. Schadt, 3 Lack. L. News, 170.

And it is the actual use to which corporate property is devoted that determines whether law is not the property of the corporation, and so should not be construed within a statute providing simply for the taxation of its property. The right to do business as a corporation is no more the property of the corporation than the right to do business as a partnership is the property of the firm. Limited partnerships are common, where the partners are not to be liable for the firm debts, and on one would contend that such a partnership falls within this statute.

The same result will be reached if we examine the other words of the section. It will be observed that it applies, not only to corporations, but to other companies or associations. Corporations and incorporated associations are placed by the statute on the same plane. It applies to all, whether incorporated or not, "having or exercising any special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons or performing any public service." This is made very clear by § 4082 in the same subdivision, which is as follows: "Whenever any person or association of persons not being a corporation nor having capital stock, shall, in this state, engage in the business of any of the corporations mentioned in the first section of this article, then the capital and property, or the certificates or other evidences of the rights or interests of the holders thereof in the business or capital and property employed therein, shall be deemed and treated as the capital stock of such person or association of persons for the purposes of taxation and all other purposes under this article, in like manner as if such person or association of persons were a corporation." Section 4086 also provides "All corporations and other persons who are re-

It is exempt from local taxation. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Newark, 60 N. J. L. 60, 37 Atl. 629.

In the following cases the property involved fell naturally within the general rule: Northampton County v. Lehigh Coal & Nav. Co. 75 Pa. 461; Richmond v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 21 Gratt. 004; Wisconsin R. Co. v. Taylor County, 52 Wis. 87, 8 N. W. 833; Petersburg R. Co. v. Northampton, 81 N. C. 487; *Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. W. 196; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Shacklett, 80 Mo. 550.

The general rule has been markedly relaxed in many cases so as to allow exemption to property either partly devoted to other than corporate uses, or as yet unused at all although acquired for corporate purposes. Such cases are the following: Schuylkill Nav. Co. v. Berks County, 11 Pa. 202; People ex rel. Selp v. Chicago & W. I. R. Co. 116 Ill. 181, 4 N. E. 480; Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Bayfield County, 87 Wis. 188, 58 N. W. 245; New Jersey Junction R. Co. v. Jersey City, 63 N. J. L. 120, 43 Atl. 577; *Southern Electric Light & P. Co. v. E. 331; Vicksburg Bank v. Worrell, 67 Miss. 47, 7 So. 219; State, Morris & E. R. Co., Prosecutor, v. Haight, 35 N. J. L. 40; State ex rel. Tillery v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 97 Mo. 348, 10 S. W. 436.

Sometimes, too, the exemption has been extended to cover property not at all requisite to the exercise of the corporate franchise, and often a mere adjunct to the corporate business, even occasionally an independent enterprise. The following are illustrative cases: State, Pennsylvania R. Co. Prosecutor v. Jersey City, 49 N. J. L. 540, 60 Am. Rep. 648, 9 Atl. 782; State v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 86 Tenn. 438, 6 S. W. 880; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Houston County, 38 Minn. 531, 38 N. W. 619; Detroit Union R. Depot & Station Co. v. Detroit, 88 Mich. 347, 50 N. W. 302; Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Bayfield County, 87 Wis. 188, 58 N. W. 245; Carondelet Canal Nav. Co. v. New Orleans, 44 La. Ann. 394, 10 So. 871.

quired to make reports to the auditor of public accounts shall pay all the taxes due the state from them into the treasury at the same time and shall be liable for and pay the same rate of interest and penalties as defaulting individuals, except where otherwise specially provided." The three sections must be read together, as they form part of one plan. From the three, taken as a whole, it is evident that the purpose was to reach persons or corporations having or exercising any special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons, or performing any public service. With this view, all persons engaged in the business of any of the corporations referred to are placed on exactly the same plane as the corporations, and such persons, as well as the corporations, are required to pay their taxes directly to the auditor. If the 1st section includes all corporations, then it would follow that all individuals engaged in the same business as the corporations must be assessed in the same way. No one has ever so construed the statute. It would not be contended that any individual or association must pay taxes directly to the auditor, unless exercising a special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to other natural persons, or performing some public service. But, if the statute does not apply to an individual, it does not apply to a corporation in the same business, for both understand it just alike. No corporation is included within the statute, unless an individual or unincorporated company situated just as it is would be covered by it. Section 4085 provides: "The property of all corporations, except where herein differently provided, shall be assessed in the name

Pac. 163; McHenry v. Alford, 168 U. S. 651, 42 L. ed. 614, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 242; Vicksburg Bank v. Worrell, 67 Miss. 47, 7 So. 219.

On the other hand, not a few cases have held that property, although acquired in good faith for corporate purposes, but not as yet so used or occupied, or which has ceased to be so used or occupied, is not exempt. Ramsey County v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 33 Minn. 537, 24 N. W. 313; St. Paul v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 39 Minn. 112, 38 N. W. 925; State v. Northwest Teleph. Exch. Co. 84 Minn. 459, 87 N. W. 1131; Lewis v. Vicksburg & M. R. Co. 67 Miss. 82, 6 So. 773; Republican Valley & W. R. Co. v. Chase County, 33 Neb. 759, 51 N. W. 132; United New Jersey R. & Canal Co. v. Jersey City, 53 N. J. L. 547, 22 Atl. 59; National Docks R. Co. v. State Bd. of Assessors, 64 N. J. L. 486, 45 Atl. 733; Neely v. Buchanan (Tenn. Ch. App.) 54 S. W. 995; Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co. v. Douglas County, 103 Wis. 75, 79 N. W. 34; Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. Lewis, 68 Miss. 29, 10 So. 32.

It is the use of the property, not of the income from it, that exempts it from taxation. Richmond County Academy v. Bohler, 80 Ga. 159, 7 S. E. 633.

Therefore, when corporate property is rented out for profit the exemption, if any it has, is lost. Illinois C. R. v. People ex rel. Hodges, 119 Ill. 137, 6 N. E. 451; People ex rel. Swigert v. Illinois C. R. Co. (Ill.) 6 West. Rep. 725; Farmers' Bank v. Henderson, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 433; St. Louis County v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 43 Minn. 510, 48 N. W. 334; State ex rel. Hayes v. C. A. 192, 93 Fed. 51.

Even though part of such property is in use by the corporation itself. Grand Lodge, F. & A. M. v. New Orleans, 44 La. Ann. 659, 11 So. 148; Allegheny County v. McKeesport Diamond Market Co. 123 Pa. 164, 16 Atl. 619.

There are several cases holding that such exemption does not extend to property merely convenient or tributary to the corporate business, such as railroad-transfer boats, wharves, bridges, and hotels or restaurants, warehouses, and freight yards used independently, etc. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Irvin, 72 Ill. 452; Pacific Coast R. Co. v. Ramage (Cal.) 37 Pac. 532; St. Joseph & G. I. R. Co. v. Devereux, 41 Fed. 14; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Newark, 60 N. J. 57 L. R. A.

And to fuel for use in locomotives. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Ellison, 113 Mich. 30, 71 N. W. 324.

Also to the horses and stables of a street passenger railway company. Delaware County v. Chester Street R. Co. 10 Pa. Co. Ct. 326.

There are cases, too, holding that exemptions of roadbed and right of way because of franchise taxation do not take in improvements and structures upon or along them. Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. Yawapal County (Ariz.) 21 Pac. 768; Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. Lesueur (Ariz.) 1 L. R. A. 244, 19 Pac. 157; Nashville & D. R. Co. v. State, 129 Ala. 142, 30 So. 619.

of the corporation in the same manner as that of a natural person." These sections are a part of the general revenue and taxation bill, providing for the payment of a uniform tax on "all property directed to be assessed for taxation," by the owner, person, or corporation assessed. Ky. Stat. § 4019. Personal property of every kind is required to be separately valued, and, if there be no appropriate column in the tax book, it shall be valued in the column headed "Miscellany." Id. § 4050. When the assessor has taken the tax list of corporations like appellant, including their tangible and intangible property, all that they have has been given in for taxation, just as in the case of a firm or any other unincorporated association. Section 4077 was not intended to apply to any of these, but only to such corporations or companies as exercised special or exclusive franchises, or performed some public service. The value of these intangible franchises could not well be fixed by an assessor, and, when these companies have paid a tax on these franchises, they have only been taxed on all their property as provided by the Constitution. The same result is reached when appellant gives in all its property to the assessor, and so all are put on the same footing.

The statute referred to received a legislative construction by the act approved March 19, 1898, entitled "An Act Concerning the Assessment and Valuation for Taxation of Corporate Franchises and Intangible Property by Cities of the First and Second Class." This act follows nearly literally all the sections of the act before us, but provides (Acts 1898, p. 96): "No assessment for city taxes shall be made by any assessor or board of valuation and assessment of the franchise of any private business. These are not assessable as a part of the franchise. Santa Clara County v. Southern P. R. Co. 118 U. S. 394, 30 L. ed. 118, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1132.

Sometimes the width of the right of way of a railroad is limited, and all property outside the limits subjected to separate taxation. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Miller County, 67 Ark. 498, 55 S. W. 926; Red Willow Co. v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 26 Neb. 660, 42 N. W. 879; Oregon Short Line R. Co. v. Gooding (Idaho) 59 Pac. 821.

And property within the right of way, or otherwise fairly a part of the franchise, is separately liable to taxation if not owned by the corporation. Com. v. Maysville & B. S. R. Co. (Ky.) 21 S. W. 342; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. People ex rel. Windmill, 153 Ill. 409, 29 L. R. A. 69, 38 N. E. 1075; State v. Red River Valley Elevator Co. 69 Minn. 131, 72 N. W. 60; State ex rel. Glenn v. Under statutes imposing taxes in the nature of duties or excises upon corporate franchises according to the excess of market value of the capital stock above the real estate and machinery locally taxed, gas mains and pipes laid in the streets are classified as machinery. Com. v. Lowell Gaslight Co. 12 Allen, 75.

VI. Franchise taxes.

a. What taxes are such.

A franchise tax and a property tax, when the two approach each other, ordinarily may be distinguished by the respective methods adopted of laying them and fixing their amounts. If a tax is imposed directly by the legislature without assessment, and its sum is measured by the amount of business done or the extent to which the conferred privileges have been enjoyed or exercised by the taxpayer irrespective of the nature or value of the taxpayer's assets, it is regarded as a franchise tax; but if the tax is computed upon a valuation of property, and assessed by assessors either where it is situated or at the owner's domicile, although franchise privileges may be included in the valuation, it is considered a property tax. This, in substance, is the test suggested by Clifford, J., writing for the court, in Society for Savings v. Colte, 6 Wall. 594, 611, 18 L. ed. 897, 904.

And yet, when one is told that a state tax of a definite percentage on the money on deposit in a bank on a named date is necessarily a 57 L. R. A.

franchise and not a property tax, because laid by statute in terms, and made payable directly into the state treasury, without any valuation by the local assessor or intervention of the local collector, one does not see that this follows. One naturally asks how the method of levying or collecting a tax can affect its incidence. And, remembering that money being at once property and the measure of value, and its amount and value being always equal, is moved to inquire again why assessors should be called in to appraise it.

But the suggested test cannot always be applied. So, to determine whether a given tax is in one or the other class one is compelled to take the course recommended by Miller, J., in Davidson v. New Orleans, 98 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 616, to get at the meaning of due process of law, viz., resort to the gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion, as the cases decided require, with the reasoning on which the decisions are founded.

"The usual and most certain test is whether the tax is upon the capital stock eo nomine without regard to its value, or at its assessed valuation in whatever it may be invested; if the former it is a franchise tax; if the latter a tax upon the property." State v. Stonewall Ins. Co. 89 Ala. 335, 338, 7 So. 753, Clopton, J.

A statute requiring all corporations, except banks, both domestic and foreign, doing business in the state, and not otherwise specifically required to pay a license tax, to pay an annual privilege tax graduated by the paid-up capital of the corporation imposes a franchise, and not a property tax. Phoenix Carpet Co. v. State, 118 Ala. 143, 22 So. 627.

A statute requiring domestic insurance companies to make a sworn return to the state treasurer of the total amount of cash capital belonging to them upon a named date annually, and pay that officer a sum equal to 1 per cent thereon, imposes a tax upon the franchise of the corporations, and not upon their capital or property as such. Colte v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 36 Conn. 512, Following Colte v. Society for Savings, 32 Conn. 173, Affirmed on error in 6 Wall. 594, 18 L. ed. 897.

A statute requiring savings banks to pay a state tax of a named percentage on the average amount of the gross deposits as held on designated days of the six months prior to the first Mondays of May and November in each year, on which days a return for the purpose is to be made by every such bank, lays a tax upon the franchise of such bank the value of which is measured by the average deposits, ness, mercantile or manufacturing corporation whose property is not devoted to a public use." It cannot be presumed that the legislature intended one rule to apply in cities of the first and second classes, and a different one in the state at large and all of its other subdivisions. It had no power, under the Constitution, to exempt from taxation property in cities of the first and second classes that is subject to taxation in other parts of the state. If the act could be so construed, it is unconstitutional. It is a well-settled rule that that construction must be adopted which will uphold both acts, rather than the one which will destroy one of them. Under this rule, the second act must be regarded as a legislative construction of the first, and that act must be construed as not applying to the classes of corporations exempted from the operation of the other act. The statute was given this practical construction by the executive officers of the state during two administrations. The legislature was well aware of the construction so put upon it, and, having not only acquiesced in it, but expressly adopted it, it should not now be departed from. Appellant is a private business corporation, organized under chapter 56 of the General Statutes, possessing no franchises or privileges not possessed, in effect, by an individual or limited partnerships engaged in the same business. Such corporations are now running stores, farms, mills, and many other enterprises in this state. They are not within the letter or spirit of the statute, and no good can come from requiring them to make the reports in question.

For these reasons, I concur in the opinion of the court delivered by Judge Du Ralle. This separate opinion is filed in addition only to state more in detail some of the reasons sustaining the conclusion reached.

and not a tax on the deposits themselves; and it accrues at the date of each return, and not earlier. Jones v. Winthrop Sav. Bank, 66 Me. 242.

A tax of a fraction of 1 per cent on the subscribed or issued and outstanding capital stock of a corporation is not a property, but an excise, tax, the amount of which is measured by the amount of the subscribed or issued and outstanding stock. Southern Gum Co. v. Laylin (Ohio) 64 N. E. 564.

A statute directing the appraisal of the railroads in a state with their franchises, rolling stock, and fixtures at their cash value, and upon such valuation the levy of a tax of 1 per cent so as to make the tax equal as near as may be to the taxes of all kinds upon other property in the districts through which such roads extend; and declaring that such appraisal shall embrace only the roadways, rolling stock, and franchises and that the lands, buildings and fixtures outside of the roadways shall be taxable in the towns where situated as other property.—Imposes a franchise tax upon railroad corporations measured in amount by the value of their franchise and property not otherwise taxed. State v. Maine C. R. Co. 74 Me. 376.

The court followed Com. v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. 12 Allen, 298, 6 Wall. 632, 18 L. ed. 904, saying that an examination of the two statutes would show that the one under consideration in that case, and the Maine act sub judice, were identical in principle, though differing in form.

A state tax on the gross receipts of a corporation is a tax on the franchise. State v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 45 Md. 361, 24 Am. Rep. 511; United States Electric Power & Light Co. v. State, 79 Md. 63, 28 Atl. 768.

A majority of the Maryland court of appeals, speaking through Robinson, J., appear to have been of the opinion, in State v. Central Sav. Bank, 67 Md. 290, 10 Atl. 290, 11 Atl. 357, that a statute of that state (Act 1874, chap. 483, § 85), which read: The president or other proper officer of any savings bank, institution, or corporation which shall receive deposits and allow interest thereon shall furnish to the comptroller, on or before the 1st day of July in each year, the aggregate amount of deposits in such corporation, and shall pay to the treasurer, on or before the 1st day of January succeeding out of the interest due to depositors the state tax on said deposits.—Imposed a franchise, and not a property tax; but, inasmuch as a previous statute identical in 57 L. R. A.

terms had been construed otherwise in State v. Sterling, 20 Md. 502, and the act of 1874 passed subsequent to that decision, they held that the legislature had adopted the earlier construction, and intended no change in the law; so the earlier decision was followed, and the statute held to impose a property, and not a franchise, tax. Alvey, Ch. J., and Bryan, J., concurring in the result, filed separate opinions in which they respectively took the ground that the earlier case was rightly decided and should be followed because soundly reasoned, and that both statutes imposed property taxes, and not franchise taxes.

One of the reasons assigned by Bigelow, Ch. J., for holding a certain tax on the deposits in a savings bank a franchise rather than a property tax, because he conceded that, being specific and not proportional, it was void if a property tax, was that, as the duty of making payment is usually devolved on those from whom a debt or charge is due, it is fair to infer, in the absence of any explicit provisions to the contrary, that the assessment was intended to be laid on the corporation by which it is to be paid and from which it is to be exacted in case payment is not voluntarily made. Com. v. People's Five Cents Sav. Bank, 5 Allen, 428.

The tax involved there was upon the average amount of deposits in savings banks in the six months prior to levying it, and it was held to be an excise or duty on a commodity within the Massachusetts Constitution. The case was followed in Com. v. Provident Inst. for Savings, 12 Allen, 312, afterwards affirmed in 6 Wall. 611, 18 L. ed. 907; also in Com. v. Lancaster Sav. Bank, 123 Mass. 493, holding that, because the tax was an excise or duty,—a franchise tax,—it was not collectible when the bank was in the hands of a receiver, and perpetually enjoined on the day it accrued. It was in effect also followed in Com. v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. 12 Allen, 298, affirmed, too, in 6 Wall. 632, 18 L. ed. 904, which held that a tax laid by general law upon domestic corporations specifically on the excess market value of their capital stock over and above the real estate and machinery locally taxed was a franchise tax,—a so-called excise or duty on a commodity,—and therefore it was immaterial that part of the capital was invested in United States bonds; that some of the stockholders were nonresidents, and that it was not proportional ad valorem.

To the like effect was the decision in Bos-

v.

Town of BELLEVUE.

(.....Ky.....)

1. An ad valorem tax upon the franchise of a street railway company is required by Const. § 174, which declares that all property, whether owned by natural persons or corporations, shall be taxed in proportion to its value.
2. The valuation by the state board of the franchises of a street railway company is conclusive as to its value for city assessment.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Campbell County ton Mfg. Co. v. Com. 144 Mass. 598, 12 N. E. 862, concerning a tax upon the market value of the shares of stock.

A statute imposing upon miscellaneous corporations a yearly tax proportioned to the amount of capital stock issued and outstanding provides for a franchise tax. State, Singer Mfg. Co., Prosecutor, v. Heppenheimer, 54 N. J. L. 439, 24 Atl. 446.

In People v. Home Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 328, Affirmed by United States Supreme Court in 119 U. S. 129, 30 L. ed. 350, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1385, the question was, Did the statute provide for a tax on property, or one upon a franchise? It was conceded, on the one hand, that neither directly nor indirectly in any form can a state tax United States bonds, or the income therefrom or the property they represent, and, upon the other, that the privileges or franchises of a corporation may lawfully be taxed by the state that bestowed them; therefore if the tax involved was a property tax it was void, if a franchise tax it was valid. The statute, so far as the Home Insurance Company was affected, after describing the corporations subject to its provisions, declared that each of them should be subject to, and pay, a tax upon its corporate franchise or business annually into the state treasury, to be computed as follows: If the dividend or dividends made or declared during the taxing year amounted to 6 per cent or over upon the par value of the capital stock, then the tax should be at the rate of one quarter of a mill upon the capital stock for each 1 per cent of dividends so made or declared. The argument against the tax was that, as it was based upon dividends, and these were in part made up of interest from United States bonds, the tax was necessarily invalid to the extent that such interest entered into the dividends. To this it was answered that there was no tax on dividends, but these were merely considered as a standard by which to measure the value of the franchise. This was assumed to be worth what was earned under it,—assumed to be the producer of the dividends,—and taxed accordingly. The New York court of appeals held the tax a franchise tax, and the United States Supreme Court agreed with it.

A statute applying to domestic corporations and foreign ones doing business in the enacting state, which possess the privilege of mining or of purchasing and selling coal in bulk and requiring from each such company a semiannual report of the number of tons it has mined or bought and the payment of a tax upon its corporate franchise at a stated rate upon each 57 L. long ton so mined or purchased not consumed by the corporation itself, imposes a franchise tax measured by the quantity of coal, and not a property tax upon the coal. Kittanning Coal Co. v. Com. 79 Pa. 100.

A statute imposing a tax on the amount of nominal capital of a bank without regard to loss or depreciation is like one annexed to the franchise as a royalty for the grant, and it is immaterial what the character or description of the property is which constitutes the capital, as the tax laid is wholly irrespective of it. New York ex rel. Bank of Commerce v. New York City & County Tax Comrs. 2 Black, 620, 17 L. ed. 451.

The United States Supreme Court had occasion, in Society for Savings v. Colte, 6 Wall. 504, 18 L. ed. 897, to determine whether a tax imposed by a Connecticut statute was laid upon the corporation franchise or upon property. The law provided that the several savings banks in the state should annually return to the comptroller the total amount of all deposits in them on July 1st in each successive year, and should yearly pay the state treasurer a sum equal to $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent on the total deposits in the respective banks on the stated day, and that such tax should be in lieu of all other taxes upon savings banks or their deposits. As a large part of the deposits in the particular institution before the court were invested in United States bonds, and so exempt if the tax rested upon the deposits, the tax was invalid if a property tax. The court, affirming that below, held the tax a franchise tax.

The same conclusion was reached at the same time in a cause involving a very similar Massachusetts tax. Provident Inst. for Savings v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 611, 18 L. ed. 907.

And the same court, at the same time, held, also, that another Massachusetts statute, which required the local assessors annually to report to the state treasurer the names of all corporations having a capital stock divided into shares and the value of their real estate and machinery locally taxed; and the corporations to make returns to the same officer annually of the amounts of their capital stock at par and the market value of the shares on a stated day; and then provided that commissioners should ascertain the excess of such market value over the value of the real estate and machinery, and that a tax upon such excess should thereupon be paid by the corporation,—imposed a franchise tax, and not one upon property. Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 632, 18 L. ed. 904. And it followed, from this conclusion, that it was immaterial in what the deposits in the first cases, and the capital in the last, was invested, although in the latter case the investments in United States bonds exceeded the entire difference between the market value of the capital stock and the value of the real estate and machinery. Chase, Ch. J., and Miller and Grier, JJ., were unable to agree in the decision of these three cases, being of the opinion that the tax in each was a tax upon property, and not upon franchises.

Franchises are property the same as any other property, and therefore must respond to taxation the same as tangible property.

Afterwards came The Delaware Railroad Tax Case, in which it was held of a statute providing that every railroad and canal company incorporated and doing business in the state should, in addition to all other taxes, pay to the state treasurer annually $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent upon the actual cash value of every share of its capital stock, with a proviso that when the line lay partly in and partly out of the state the corporation should only be required to pay on so many of the shares as would be in proportion to the whole number as the length of the line within the state bore to the total length,—that it was not obnoxious to the objection that it imposed taxes upon property out of the jurisdiction because a greater number of stockholders than the ratio of mileage within the state to the total mileage were non-residents, not yet because the ratio of mileage within the state to the total mileage was not that of the capital invested nor the value of the corporate property within the state, for the reason that the tax was laid neither on the shares nor the corporate property, but was a franchise tax upon the corporation measured by a percentage upon the cash value of a certain proportionate part of the shares of the capital stock, which, though an arbitrary rule was approximately a just one, and within the legislative power to adopt. 18 Wall. 206, sub nom. Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 21 L. ed. 888, Reversing 7 Phila. 555.

b. What taxes that seem to be such are not.

Coming to the cases of judicial exclusion, one finds a respectable array of decisions holding that taxes apparently laid upon corporations as excises are really taxes upon their property.

An Alabama statute (Code, § 453, subd. 9) levied a tax upon the capital stock of all domestic corporations, except such portions of the capital stock as might be invested in property which was otherwise taxed as property the same to be paid by the corporation; but provided that when such corporation paid the taxes in that chapter of the statute levied upon the shares into which its capital stock was divided, or the same was paid by the shareholders, such corporation should only be required to pay the taxes levied upon the real and personal estate owned by it, unless its investments were otherwise taxed by the same statute. A controlling question was whether this tax was upon the corporate property or upon the corporate privileges and franchises. It was insisted that it was a franchise tax upon the theory that the statute prescribed, as the rule for determining the value of the capital stock for the purposes of taxation, the aggregate market value of the shares into which it was divided, and the case of Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 632, 18 L. ed. 904, was relied on to support this contention. The court, however, declined to regard this case as one of general authority, deeming it due wholly to the peculiar phraseology of the Massachusetts Constitution and the settled course of decisions of the courts of that state, and held the tax one upon the property of the corporation. State v. Stonewall Ins. Co. 89 Ala. 335, 7 So. 753.

A general law requiring all railroads once a year to make a return to a state officer of the number of shares of their stock, the market value thereof, the amount at a stated time of their funded and floating debt, and to pay a sum equal to 1 per cent of the market value of such stock and indebtedness; and which provides that the valuation thus obtained shall be regarded as fixing the value of railroads and of their rights, franchises, and property for the purposes of taxation, and that the tax shall be in lieu of all other taxes on railroad property; and which, in another part, speaks of the "tax hereby imposed upon the property and franchises of any railroad,"—imposes a property, and not a franchise or privilege, tax. Nichols v. New Haven & N. Co. 42 Conn. 103.

This case is notable in two respects. It is said in it that *Colte v. that the tax is imposed, neither upon the shares, nor upon the property, of the corporation, but is a tax upon the corporation itself measured by a percentage upon the cash value of a certain proportional part of the shares of its capital stock. He declares the two cited cases by far the better authority, and that the third cannot be reconciled with these well considered ones.

A percentage tax laid upon the deposits in a savings bank, and collected out of the property of the depositors, although paid through the medium of the bank under a statute substituting the corporate agent for the depositors themselves, who formerly were taxed on their deposits as money at interest, and where the tax is declared to be in full for all taxes on the deposits or on the depositors on account thereof, is a tax upon property, and not a franchise or privilege tax, and, hence, is unaffected by the insolvency or liquidation of the bank or its ceasing to exercise or being deprived of the franchise or privilege. Bartlett v. Carter, 59 N. H. 105.

The difficulty of distinguishing between the capital of a corporation and the property in which it is invested, which renders tests for determining whether a tax is on the property or the franchises generally uncertain and unsatisfactory, according to Clopton, J., in State v. Stonewall Ins. Co. 89 Ala. 335, 338, 7 So. 753, is illustrated in the controversies over the Kentucky act of 1874, § 4077. Notwithstanding its explicit language in declaring that certain corporations, companies, and associations shall each, in addition to the other taxes imposed by law, annually pay a tax on its franchise to the state and another tax thereon to the county, city, town, or taxing district where its franchise may be exercised, it is declared plain, upon consideration of the other provisions of the act, that the tax is not imposed upon the corporate franchise in the technical legal sense, since it is equally laid in the same manner upon companies and associations having neither corporate existence nor franchises, and attaches to both domestic and foreign corporations. It was thus, it is said, the purpose of the legislature to tax the capital stock by said act as an entirety to include the whole corporate property, tangible and intangible, and when the owner is a foreign organization, such proportion of that entirety as is within the state, and therefore to impose a property, and not a franchise, tax. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Norman, 77 Fed. 13.

17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 527, but not without protest from White, Field, Harlan and Brown, JJ., who, dissenting on the same grounds that they did in Adams Exp. Co. v. Ohio, 165 U. S. 194, 41 L. ed. 683, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 305, took pains further to point out that while the majority with some plausibility held that the Ohio statute only purported to tax the tangible property within the state, but empowered the assessing board to augment the value of it by the use it was put to, to enhance that value by drawing to it intangible elements, without the state, which the dissenters both then considered and then still regarded as a mere disguise,—a distinction without a difference,—the Kentucky statute threw off even that thin disguise, and plainly in unambiguous language imposed a franchise tax, or laid an impost upon what was beyond the jurisdiction of the state.

In the same state, also, it has been held that a statute requiring corporations to report under oath to the assessor on or before a stated date annually, a complete statement of all their property, tangible and intangible, and the total cash value thereof, imposes no tax upon the corporate franchise. Covington Gaslight Co. v. Dist. Atty. v. Simmons, 70 Miss. 485, 12 So. 477.

Statutes in New Jersey for the assessment and taxation of private corporations at the full amount of their capital stock paid in, and accumulated surplus, with provisions that any corporate real estate in another state shall not be estimated in such surplus, and that persons holding the capital stock shall not be assessed therefor, do not impose taxes on the corporations as such, rather than on their property,—do not lay franchise taxes, but property taxes; hence nontaxable securities are to be deducted. Newark City Bank v. Fourth Ward Assessors, 80 N. J. L. 13; State, International & Life Assur. Co., Prosecutor, v.

Guffy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant instituted this action in the Campbell circuit court for the purpose of perpetually enjoining the appellee from collecting from appellant certain taxes, which it is alleged that appellee was illegally and unlawfully attempting to collect. The substance of the averments contained in the petition is that prior to the 26th of May, 1892, the appellant operated a horse railway between the town of Bellevue and the city of Newport, and none of the cars upon said road were operated between the town of Bellevue and the city of Cincinnati, but the passengers going from the town of Bellevue to the city of Cincinnati, or from Cincinnati to the town of Bellevue, were required to change cars in the city of Newport; that prior to May 26, 1892, appellant had the right to charge, and did charge, for the carriage of a passenger between the town of Bellevue and Fountain Square, in the city of Cincinnati, and between Fountain Square and the town of Bellevue, at the rate of 10 cents cash fare, or three tickets for 25 cents, each of said tickets entitling the passenger holding the same to one ride between said points; that it was deemed important for the interest of the town of Bellevue that a more rapid means of transit should be established between said town and the city of Cincinnati, for the convenience of citizens residing in said town of Bellevue, and that a less rate of fare for carrying passengers between said points should be charged, and that plaintiff's cars should be so operated between Bellevue and Cincinnati as to avoid passengers changing cars in Newport; that on the 26th of May, 1892, Haight, 35 N. J. L. 279; Merchant's Ins. Co. v. Newark, 54 N. J. L. 138, 23 Atl. 305.

The tax imposed upon the capital stock of corporations by the Pennsylvania act of 1891 (P. L. 229) is a tax upon property and assets, including the franchises, but not a privilege or franchise tax. Com. v. Delaware, S. & S. R. Co. 14 Pa. Co. Ct. 440, Affirmed in 185 Pa. 44, 30 Atl. 522; Com. v. Manor Gas Coal Co. 8 Pa. Dist. R. 258, Reversed without affecting this point in 188 Pa. 195, 41 Atl. 605; Com. v. New York, P. & O. R. Co. 188 Pa. 169, 41 Atl. 594, Followed in Com. v. Ontario C. & S. R. Co. 188 Pa. 205, 41 Atl. 607; Com. v. Beech Creek R. Co. 188 Pa. 203, 41 Atl. 605; Com. v. Fall Brook R. Co. 188 Pa. 199, 41 Atl. 606.

It has been settled by numerous decisions, says the court in one of these cases, that the tax on capital stock imposed by the taxing acts of Pennsylvania is not a franchise or license tax, but is a tax on the property and assets of the corporation. But it by no means follows that capital stock and tangible property are identical, either in substance or value. The capital stock, it is true, represents the property and assets of the corporation, but it represents also the value of its franchises and privileges and facilities for doing business and the success with which the business is carried on, so far as these are denoted and expressed by the pecuniary results, and the tax on capital stock is, by express terms of the act of 1891, intended to reach these elements of value. Com. v. Delaware, S. & S. R. Co. 3 Dauph. Co. Rep. 249, Affirmed in 185 Pa. 44, 30 Atl. 522.

Later, although it was urged that the case at bar was a novel and an extreme one and ought not to be extended, the higher court declared that it saw no reason to modify or restrict the decision. Com. v. Ontario C. & S. R. Co. 188 Pa. 203, 41 Atl. 607. Which is equivalent to saying that a tax upon a franchise is not a franchise tax.

Again, it has been said that the statute (Pa. Act June 8, 1891, P. L. 229) having in express terms by title and in preamble declared the subject of taxation to be all the property of corporations having capital stock, and the settled interpretation by the supreme court in Pennsylvania of a tax on capital stock being that it is a tax upon all the property of the corporation, it is clear that the learned judge of the court below did not err in his conclusion of law that a tax on the capital stock of the corporation is a tax on its property and assets including its franchises. Com. v. New York, P. & O. R. Co. 188 Pa. 169, 41 Atl. 594.

There is a dissent in this and kindred cases known as the capital-stock cases by Mitchell, 57 L. R. A.

Green, and Williams, JJ., on the ground that the statute imposed a tax on the capital stock eo nomine at actual value not less than the average selling price during the year, and that this is a tax on the share stock in the aggregate, or the interest of the stockholders after the debts are paid, and not a tax on the corporate property and assets in gross, plus the franchise. They assert that the decision confuses two distinct things.

The court adopted the same view of the act in Com. v. Ontario C. & S. R. Co. 188 Pa. 203, 41 Atl. 607.

c. Taxes on capital stock.

For a full discussion of franchise taxes upon corporations, whether measured by capital stock or imposed upon capital stock eo nomine, the reader is referred to the separate note in this series on the taxation of capital stock of corporations in the United States. Not only would it extend the limits of this note too far to embrace all the cases in point, but the view necessarily would be a partial one, since these cases are so intimately related to, not to say blended with, those respecting taxes upon capital stock regarded as property that it is a logical necessity to treat of all in a single comprehensive commentary. In Pennsylvania, as has been seen, a tax upon capital stock is held to be one upon the property and assets of the corporation, but these are said to include the franchise. In Illinois taxes are laid upon combined capital stock and franchises eo nomine. In New York the statutes imposing state taxes upon capital stock call them taxes upon the franchise or business of the corporation, while the statutes imposing local taxes upon capital stock and surplus are held not to warrant the taxation of corporate franchises.

The cases below, therefore, are those of only general application.

When a corporation returns, for the purposes of taxation, its capital stock as exceeding many times in value its entire tangible property, it is taxable on the excess, notwithstanding a statute providing that, where the tangible property of a corporation is assessed its shares of capital stock shall not be. Hylland v. Central Iron & Steel Co. 129 Ind. 68, 13 L. R. A. 515, 28 N. E. 308.

Capital stock, from which the value of tangible property is to be deducted to ascertain the value of a corporate franchise for taxation within the Kentucky statute, § 4079, means all the corporate property, real and personal, tangible and intangible, assets and franchises for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to change its horse cars into electric cars, and for the purpose of inducing this plaintiff to reduce its fare, and in consideration of the change by the plaintiff from the horse-car system to the electric-car system, and to obviate the necessity of changing cars at Newport, the town of Bellevue, on the said 26th of May, 1892, duly and regularly passed by its then board of trustees an ordinance entitled "An Ordinance Authorizing the South Covington & Cincinnati Street-Railway Company to Substitute Electrical for Animal Power upon Its Street Railway in the Town of Bellevue." So much of the ordinance as is material is here copied, which is as follows: "In consideration of said reduction of fares between the town of Bellevue and the city of Cincinnati, and the city of Cincinnati and Bellevue, and in consideration of equipping said line with electric power, and so insuring rapid transit over said line, the South Covington & Cincinnati Street-Railway Company is hereby released from any and all obligations to keep any part of the streets occupied by its track in the town of Bellevue in repair, and is released from the payment of car license except as hereinafter provided, and from the payment of taxes of any and every kind, except an ad valorem tax upon its real estate and personal property." It is further alleged in the petition that appellant did change from the horse-car system to the electric-car system, and proceeded to discharge all the duties required by said contract. It is also alleged in the petition that the town of Bellevue has never, by ordinance or otherwise, provided for the levying of, or requiring the payment of, a franchise tax

Henderson Bridge Co. v. Com. 99 Ky. 623, 29 L. R. A. 73, 31 S. W. 486.

Although the Constitution and laws require all property to be assessed at its fair cash value, and corporate property to be rated no higher than that of individuals, and the local assessors value individual property at but 66 per cent of its actual value, a corporation taxable upon its franchise is not exonerated because assessed by a state board at the full actual value of its capital stock after deducting the assessed value of all its tangible property. Paducah Street R. Co. v. McCracken County, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1294, 49 S. W. 178.

References in license tax acts to the declared or nominal capital or surplus of business or banking institutions do not constitute taxes upon the capital and surplus, but merely a method of classifying the banks and graduating the licenses. State v. Citizen's Bank, 52 La. Ann. 1086, 27 So. 709.

Under statutes imposing taxes in the nature of duties or excises upon corporate franchises according to the excess of the market value of the capital stock above the real estate and machinery locally taxed, the purpose of deducting the value of the real estate and machinery from the aggregate of the shares of capital stock to fix the basis of the state franchise tax is to avoid double taxation. This merely leaves elements once taxed out of the assessable value of the franchise; it does not make the tax one upon property rather than upon privilege. Com. v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. 12 Allen, 298.

Under such a statute, which also requires a return from the stock department of every insurance company doing both a stock and a mutual business as a basis for such franchise tax, a mutual insurance company doing a mutual business exclusively is subject to no franchise tax, duty, or excise upon the excess market value of the shares of an original stock subscription made as a guarantee to warrant beginning business and subject to redemption, and until redeemed entitled to 7 per cent annual dividends, as this really constitutes a debt of the company. Com. v. Berkshire L. Ins. Co. 98 Mass. 25.

If a tax can be considered as in the nature of a privilege tax or royalty upon the franchise, it may be held valid regardless of the fact that it is laid upon capital stock rather than on the franchise eo nomine.—Holly Springs Sav. & Ins. Co. v. Marshall County, 52 Miss. 281, 24 Am. Rep. 668.

A general tax law requiring all domestic corporations to pay a yearly license fee or percentage tax upon capital stock, with a proviso that it shall not apply to railways, canals, banks, and certain other named corporations, or to manufacturing companies or mining companies carrying on business in the state, exempts, not all manufacturing companies, but only such as carry on business within the state. State v. Underground Cable Co. (N. J. Eq.) 18 Atl. 581; Standard Underground Cable Co. v. Atty. Gen. 46 N. J. Eq. 270, 19 Atl. 733; American Glucose Co. v. State, 43 N. J. Eq. 280, 5 Atl. 803.

In the absence of any provision in a general corporation tax law fixing a date when a yearly license fee or tax of a percentage on capital stock imposed thereby accrues, the date when the act took effect controls, and the amount of capital stock on each recurring anniversary thereof is the basis of computation. Brewing Improv. Co. v. State Bd. of Assessors (N. J. L.) 47 Atl. 426.

And for the purpose of affording a basis for such tax, capital stock is issued and outstanding within the meaning of the statute, when subscribed for, and the first call of 5 per cent met thereon upon the proceeds of which the corporation has begun business, although no certificates of stock have been delivered. American Pig Iron Storage Co. v. State Bd. of Assessors, 56 N. J. L. 389, 29 Atl. 160.

When the statute does not penalize a corporation for neglect or refusal to make a return of how much of its stock is issued and outstanding as a basis for such tax the assessors are not warranted in assessing a corporation thus in default upon its total authorized capital. State, People's Invest. Co., Prosecutor, v. State Bd. of Assessors, 66 N. J. L. 175, 48 Atl. 579.

A franchise tax laid upon a railroad corporation pursuant to an act exempting the property thereof for a definite time, and providing that afterwards the legislature may levy a tax not exceeding 25 cents a share on each share of the capital stock yearly whenever the annual profits exceed 6 per cent, is to be collected from the corporation, not the stockholders. State ex rel. Bain v. Seaboard & R. R. Co. 52 Fed. 450.

In statutes imposing a new tax upon the franchisees or business of certain corporations, theretofore taxable upon their property, to be computed according to dividends made or declared during the prior year of 6 per cent or more upon the par value of the capital stock, the referred-to dividends are simply made the measure of the annual value of the franchise upon which the yearly tax is to be paid, and the statutes are prospective in operation. The taxes thus imposed are payable, not for past, on the franchise of corporations doing business in, or exercising the rights and privileges of a franchise within, the corporate limits of said town, and is without right, power, or authority to levy or collect a tax upon the franchise of plaintiff. It is further alleged that the said town of Bellevue is claiming and asserting the right, power, and authority to levy, assess, and collect said franchise tax from this plaintiff, under and by virtue of the terms and conditions of § 4077 of the Kentucky Statutes of the state of Kentucky, and an act of the legislature of said state passed and approved March 22, 1894. The plaintiff says that said act, and especially that portion thereof that provides that corporations, and especially street-railway companies, shall pay tax upon its franchise to each incorporated city, town, or taxing district in which its franchise is exercised, or in which it does business, is contrary and in direct violation of § 181 of the Constitution of Kentucky, and therefore void. It is also alleged that the same is in violation of its contract aforesaid, and therefore in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, because it impairs the contract aforesaid.

The appellant demurred to the petition, which demurrer was sustained to all the petition, except the allegation that the tax is levied and sought to be collected under § 4077 of the statute. We copy as follows from the opinion of the circuit court upon the demurrer in question:

"The town of Bellevue seeks to collect $295.95 on a valuation of $18,674.71, placed upon plaintiff's franchise; and plaintiff seeks to enjoin the collection thereof. Plaintiff relies upon a contract between it but for the future, enjoyment of the franchise. Hence, a corporation that in a given year paid a regular dividend of 8¼ per cent, and also distributed to its stockholders because its charter was expiring (although a renewal was contemplated) an accumulated fund amounting to 50 per cent of its capital, made up of the profits of several past years before the statute was enacted, is not chargeable on enhanced franchise tax computed on such distributed fund, because that did not constitute a dividend within the meaning of the statute. People v. Albany Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 458.

The words "capital stock" in § 182 of the New York tax law, providing that every corporation organized by or pursuant to law in the state shall pay to the state treasurer annually a franchise tax, to be computed upon the basis of the amount of capital stock employed within the state, refer to the capital or property of the corporation, and not to the share stock. People ex rel. Lackawanna Transp. Co. v. Knight, 77 N. Y. Supp. 898.

d. Interference with Federal agencies and burdens on Federal grants.

1. Franchises.

It is conceded that a franchise granted by the United States or an agency employed by the general government in the exercise of its constitutional powers is not, without its consent, liable to state taxation. It will be found, upon examination, that every case in which a franchise tax, really or apparently such, laid by a state upon a corporation holding a Federal franchise or constituting a Federal agency was sustained, that the tax was held, either not to be a franchise tax, or, if such, to rest upon a franchise granted by the taxing government, or to have been laid by the consent, expressed or implied, of Congress.

(a) Railroads.

The right of a state to tax a railroad chartered by Congress came in question early with respect of the transcontinental lines. A railroad incorporated by the territory of Kansas was absorbed in the Union Pacific system, and afterwards subjected to taxation by the state of Kansas. The tax, however, was a property tax. The right and power of the state to thus tax were upheld notwithstanding the argument that the territory of Kansas in incorporating the railroad was the agent or deputy of the United States, rather than an independent sovereign state in embryo, and therefore the road 57 L. R. A.

must be regarded as a creature of Congress and a means or agency for carrying into effect the governmental powers, and so exempt. Thomson v. Union P. R. Co. 9 Wall. 579, 19 L. ed. 792.

In a later case the state of Nebraska having taxed the Union Pacific Railroad upon a mileage basis, the validity of the tax was called in question again. In this case the charter came directly from Congress, but the court held that this fact made no difference, and followed the preceding case. Union P. R. Co. v. Peniston, 18 Wall. 5, 21 L. ed. 787.

That, too, was a property tax, and the court was divided upon it. Swayne, J., concurred in the result, but did so upon the ground that, although the road was a national instrumentality of such a character that Congress might interpose and protect it from state taxation, it was not the intention of Congress so to do, and the power might be, and had been, waived. Bradley, J., with the concurrence of Field, J., dissented upon the authority of McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. ed. 579, and Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat. 738, 6 L. ed. 204, asserting that the case was within the principles thereof as summed up by Marshall, Ch. J., in Weston v. Charleston, 2 Pet. 466, 7 L. ed. 487, and that the facts distinguished the case from Thomson v. Union P. R. Co. 9 Wall. 579, 19 L. ed. 792, while Hunt, J., dissented without expressing any opinion of his own, or concurring in any other dissent.

In that case was formulated the rule, vis.: That the exemption of Federal agencies from state taxation depends, not on the nature of the agents or the mode of constituting them, but on the effect and incidence of the tax,—whether it deprives them of power to serve the government as they were intended to serve it, or hinders the efficient exercise of the power. A tax on their property has no such necessary effect; a tax on their operations is a direct obstruction. A state, therefore, may tax their property, but not their franchises or right to be and perform their corporate functions; nor may it lay a tax on any acts they are authorized to do. The case was followed, with respect to a tax on the real estate and personal property, in State v. Central P. R. Co. 10 Nev. 47, where the court contented itself by a simple reference to that case, in which it declared, the United States Supreme Court decided that a corporation sustaining substantially, if not identically, the same relations was not exempt.

It necessarily followed that a railroad holding such Federal franchises, or thus constiand the city, evidenced by an ordinance approved May 26, 1892, and the acceptance thereof; the material clause being, 'And is [the plaintiff being referred to] released from the payment of car license, except as hereinafter provided, and from the payment of tax of any and every kind, except an ad valorem tax upon its real estate and personal property.' When this contract was made, the city was acting under a charter enacted March 4, 1882 (§ 12), which provided that the board of trustees shall not grant any special privilege to any person, corporation, or company, nor exempt any such person or persons from the payment of an annual tax. Section 45 is that the board of trustees of the town of Bellevue are hereby vested with power, by ordinance, to levy and collect an annual tax upon all real, personal, and mixed property within the corporate limits of the town of Bellevue, including bank stock, bridge stock, money in possession, notes, bonds of all kinds, except United States bonds, choses in action, improvements, and all real property whatsoever, not to exceed the sum of $1 on each $100 valuation on such real, personal, and mixed property in one year.

"Plaintiff contends that § 12, quoted, prohibits exemption of persons, but not corporations, from taxation, and, by construction thereof, exempts all corporations. Without following the argument made, it is sufficient to say that the word 'such,' used to qualify the word 'person or persons,' indisputably refers to, and makes a prohibition including, person, corporation, or company. The words 'annual tax,' used in said section, refer to the tax authorized by § 45, quoted above; and it may be well argued that the tuted, which was also a corporation by the law of a state, was taxable in the state which incorporated it, certainly upon its property therein (Huntington v. Central P. R. Co. 2 Sawy. 503, Fed. Cas. No. 6,911), and upon the franchise derived from the state. Central P. R. Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization, 60 Cal. 35.

This case was overruled in San Benito County v. Southern P. R. Co. 77 Cal. 518, 19 Pac. 827, the overruling being constrained by virtue of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in California v. Central P. R. Co. 127 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 150, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 153, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073, but this point is not necessarily affected thereby.

But franchises conferred by the United States cannot be included. California v. Central P. R. Co. 127 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 150, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 153, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073; San Benito County v. Southern P. R. Co. 77 Cal. 518, 19 Pac. 827; People v. Central P. R. Co. 105 Cal. 576, 38 Pac. 905.

That is, a state may tax its own franchise, not that of the United States. Central P. R. Co. v. California, 162 U. S. 91, 40 L. ed. 903, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 766. Field, J., dissented in this case on the ground that the record showed there was but one franchise,—the national grant,—and that was not subject to state taxation. Harlan, J., dissented for alleged error in exclusion of testimony, and White, J., contented himself by a mere concurrence in the result.

The same decision was followed in Southern P. R. Co. v. California, 162 U. S. 167, 40 L. ed. 929, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 794.

In Arizona the conclusion was reached that an organized territory may lawfully tax a corporate franchise granted by Congress when the taxing statute has received congressional approval, as this is an implied permission. Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. Lesueur (Ariz.) 1 L. R. A. 244, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 189, 19 Pac. 157.

(b) Telegraphs.

When a telegraph company has accepted the provisions of the act of Congress of July 24, 1866 (U. S. Rev. Stat., §§ 5283-5289), and thus acquired a right or privilege to enter any state and construct, maintain, and operate its lines over the public domain and navigable waters and all military and post roads, it is, of course not liable to taxation by any state in which it operates upon such franchise. Therefore, state statutes which impose so-called franchise taxes upon such telegraph companies have to be construed as laying property taxes, otherwise they would be void. Western 57 L. R. A.

U. Teleg. Co. v. Atty. Gen. 125 U. S. 530, 31 L. ed. 790, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961; Atty. Gen. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 141 U. S. 40, 35 L. ed. 628, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 889; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Norman, 77 Fed. 13.

But if default is made in paying the tax the operation of the business cannot be prevented by injunction. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atty. Gen. 125 U. S. 530, 31 L. ed. 790, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961.

Such a company may be taxed upon purely local and internal messages, but not those going beyond the state. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Alabama State Bd. of Assessment, 132 U. S. 472, sub nom. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Seay, 33 L. ed. 409, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 726, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 161, Reversing 80 Ala. 273, 60 Am. Rep. 99.

It may not appropriate city streets for its poles and wires without making compensation to the municipality. St. Louis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 148 U. S. 92, 37 L. ed. 360, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 455; Philadelphia v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. 67 Hun, 21, 21 N. Y. Supp. 556.

And it may be subjected to a city license tax on its occupation or business in the city. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Richmond, 28 Gratt. 1.

But a direct tax upon the franchise is void. San Francisco v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 96 Cal. 140, 17 L. R. A. 301, 31 Pac. 10.

(c) Bridges.

Bridge corporations whose structures span navigable streams dividing two or more states, and which necessarily have been built in conformity to acts of Congress regulating their heights above the surface, dimensions of draws, breadth of spans, etc., and which have been made post roads, have asserted their exemption from state franchise taxes imposed by the states upon whose soil their ends rest, upon the ground that they are Federal agencies, or hold non-taxable Federal franchises. As they hold, too, franchises from the states, and are, like railroads, subject to taxation on these, they have failed to escape. Henderson Bridge Co. v. Com. 99 Ky. 623, 29 L. R. A. 73, 31 S. W. 486, Affirmed in 166 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 953, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 532; Keokuk & H. Bridge Co. v. Illinois, 175 U. S. 626, 44 L. ed. 299, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 205.

(d) Banks.

It was settled in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. ed. 579, that the franchise of a bank chartered by act of Congress as a sentence 'and all manner of property whatever' includes franchises. It therefore seems to the court that not only was the town of Bellevue not authorized either expressly or by necessary implication to exempt a person or corporation from taxation, but was expressly prohibited from doing so, and that, therefore, the contract affords no protection against the tax.

"Section 4077 of the Kentucky Statutes provides that 'every . . . street railway company . . . shall, in addition to the other taxes imposed on it by law, annually pay a tax on its franchise to the state, and a local tax thereon to the county, incorporated city, town, and taxing district where its franchise may be exercised,' etc. Section 181 of the Constitution provides that the general assembly 'shall not impose taxes for the purposes of any county, city, town or other municipal corporation, but may by general laws confer on the proper authorities thereof, respectively, the power to assess and collect such taxes.' Plaintiff says that the defendant is claiming the right to assess, levy, and collect tax under said § 4077, and that said section is in conflict with § 181 of the Constitution. If § 4077 imposes a tax for county or city purposes, in so far as it does, it is unquestionably unconstitutional; but it does not impose such tax. That section is but a part of subdivision 1, article 3, of chapter 108 of the Statutes, which provides a scheme for assessment or valuation of franchises, and an apportionment among the taxing districts in which the franchise may be exercised. There cannot be an imposition of a tax without the amount or the rate being fixed, and no attempt is made to fix one.

government agency is beyond the power of a state to tax. The Supreme Court was asked, in Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat. 738, 6 L. ed. 204, to re-examine this case upon that point, and did so, but adhered to its former holding. As announced at the outset, it is not within the scope of this note to discuss the taxation of national banks, so the topic may be dismissed at this point with the general statement that a state cannot impose taxes upon, nor authorize the taxation of, the franchises of national banks. This may be considered settled. Sumpter County v. National Bank, 62 Ala. 464, 34 Am. Rep. 30; Macon v. First Nat. Bank, 59 Ga. 648; Second Nat. Bank v. Caldwell, 18 Fed. 429; First Nat. Bank v. Richmond, 39 Fed. 309; National Bank v. Richmond, 42 Fed. 877; Farmers' & T. Nat. Bank v. Hoffman, 98 Iowa, 119, 61 N. W. 418; *First Nat. Bank v. 2. United States bonds.

When a state imposes a franchise tax upon a corporation measured by the amount of its capital stock, it is immaterial what such stock is invested in. The tax is subject to no abatement because a part of the capital stock is invested in nontaxable United States bonds. This proposition has been firmly established by the cases of Colte v. Society for Savings, 32 Conn. 173, on Error, 6 Wall. 594, 18 L. ed. 897; Com. v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. 12 Allen, 298, on Error, 6 Wall. 682, 18 L. ed. 904; Com. v. Provident 57 L. R. A.

Inst. for Savings, 12 Allen, 312, on Error, 6 Wall. 611, 18 L. ed. 907; People v. Home Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 328, on Error, 119 U. S. 129, 30 L. ed. 350, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1385, on Rehearing, 134 U. S. 594, 33 L. ed. 1025, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 593; Monroe County Sav. Bank v. Rochester, 37 N. Y. 867; People ex rel. Bank of Commonwealth v. New York Tax & A. Comrs. 23 N. Y. 193; Colte v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 36 Conn. 512; Manufacturers' Ins. Co. v. Lord, 99 Mass. 146, 96 Am. Dec. 715; Philadelphia Contributionship for Ins. v. Com. 98 Pa. 48; Holly Springs Sav. & Ins. Co. v. Marshall County, 52 Miss. 281, 24 Am. Rep. 668.

The difficulty is ever, not with the principle, but in the application of it. The vigorous dissents in the United States Supreme Court in the cited cases are based upon the proposition that the taxes sub judice were upon property rather than franchises. When this is the case the assessment must always be lowered to the extent of the investment in United States bonds. State, International & L. Assur. Co., Prosecutor, v. Haight, 85 N. J. L. 279; Newark City Bank v. Fourth Ward Assessor, 30 N. J. L. 13; People ex rel. Ithaca Sav. Bank v. Beers, 67 How. Pr. 219.

A tax on the income from United States bonds is void. Bank of Kentucky v. Com. 9 Bush, 46.

A corporation subjected to a tax upon, or one measured by, its net earnings or income is not entitled to deduct from its receipts the difference between United States bonds redeemed during the year at their face value and the amount paid at a premium years before on buying them. Philadelphia Contributionship for Ins. v. Com. 98 Pa. 48.

3. Patents and copyrights.

A patent or a patent right is not subject to state taxation, either as a piece of property, or as a franchise or privilege. People ex rel. Edison Electric Illum. Co. v. Brooklyn Bd. of Assessors, 156 N. Y. 417, 42 L. R. A. 290, 51 N. E. 289; People ex rel. Edison Electric Illum. Co. v. Neff, 19 App. Div. 599, 46 N. Y. Supp. 388; People ex rel. Edison Electric Illum. Co. v. Harkness, 44 N. Y. Supp. 51; People ex rel. New York & N. J. Teleph. Co. v. Neff, 15 App. Div. 8, 44 N. Y. Supp. 46; Com. v. Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co. 151 Pa. 265, 24 Atl. 1107, 1111; Com. v. Westinghouse Air Brake Co. 151 Pa. 276, 24 Atl. 1111, 1113; Com. v. Philadelphia Co. 157 Pa. 527, 27 Atl. 378; Com. v. Edison Electric Light Co. 157 Pa. 529, 27 Atl. 379; Com. v. Davis-Colby Ore Roaster Co. 1 Dauph. Co. Rep. 118.

"It is argued that § 181 provides for conferring upon the proper authorities of counties, cities, etc., the power to assess, and that, therefore, such officer cannot be empowered to assess franchises for county or city taxes. The fallacy of this argument lies in the meaning given to the word 'assess.' In the place used, it means to levy a tax, and does not mean the valuation of property for taxation. That the Constitution makers did not intend to forbid the valuation of property for local taxation by the state board is apparent from their continuing in force that method of valuation of railroads for taxation, and which is now in force.

"The plaintiff also contends that, under the Constitution, an ad valorem tax cannot be levied upon the franchise; that all the legislature may do is to authorize the imposition of license fees. This question will not be considered now, because of the conclusion of the court that § 4077 does not impose a tax. The demurrer to paragraphs 1 and 4 of the petition will be sustained, and the demurrer to paragraph 3, which charges that the taxation is levied and sought to be collected under § 4077 of the statute, will be overruled. The motion for an injunction will be retained until final judgment."

Appellee thereafter filed its answer, which may be considered a traverse of all the averments of the petition which tend to show a right to the relief sought. The answer shows that the appellee was entitled to levy and collect, for municipal purposes, an annual ad valorem tax, not exceeding 75 cents on every $100 on all property taxable by law for such purposes, and, in addition,

The immunity of patents and patent rights does not prevent state taxation of patented articles as pieces of property the same as other chattels (Webber v. Virginia, 103 U. S. 344, 28 L. ed. 565, Reversing on other grounds 83 Gratt. 898, and Followed in Ex parte Thomas, 71 Cal. 204, 12 Pac. 58); nor free the patentee from any of the pains and penalties imposed by a police regulation conserving the public safety and reasonably adapted to the professed end. Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S. 501, 24 L. ed. 1115.

And copyrights, like patents and patent rights, are equally beyond the power of the state to tax. People ex rel. A. J. Johnson Co. v. Roberts, 159 N. Y. 70, 45 L. R. A. 126, 53 N. E. 685, Reversing 85 App. Div. 624, 54 N. Y. Supp. 1112.

But when a tax is laid upon a corporation as a franchise or privilege tax measured by its capital stock, it is no more material that such capital stock is invested in patents or patent rights than as if invested in United States bonds. State, Marsden Co., Prosecutor, v. State Bd. of Assessors, 61 N. J. L. 461, 39 Atl. 638.

It is true that a recent New York case has held the contrary, and decided that in assessing a franchise tax upon a domestic corporation measured by its appraised capital patent rights belonging to the company cannot be included. People ex rel. United States Aluminum Printing Plate Co. v. Knight, 67 App. Div. 333, 73 N. Y. Supp. 745. But this decision is certainly against the weight of authority, and credit must be given to Smith, J., for dissenting. The majority opinion conceded that there were several New York cases, resting upon the authority of People v. Home Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 328, holding the contrary, viz.: People ex rel. Edison Electric Illum. Co. v. Wemple, 61 Hun, 53, 15 N. Y. Supp. 711 (which, by the by, was reversed in 129 N. Y. 664, 29 N. E. 812, on the ground that the relator was exempt as a manufacturing company), and People ex rel. Edison Electric Light Co. v. Wemple, 63 Hun, 444, 18 N. Y. Supp. 511 (also reversed in 148 N. Y. 690, 43 N. E. 176, because stock holdings in foreign corporations were held not to be capital employed within the state); and that these rulings were sanctioned by the views expressed in People ex rel. Edison Electric Light Co. v. Campbell, 138 N. Y. 543, 20 L. R. A. 453, 34 N. E. 370, in the course of a decision that the tax involved could only be imposed upon so much of the capital stock of the relator as was employed within the state, and that, contrary to the decision below and the contention of the comptroller, some of it was not so employed, while, as against the contention of the relator that none of it was, that a part was; yet they considered that the later case of People ex rel. A. J. Johnson Co. v. Roberts, 159 N. Y. 70, 45 L. R. A. 126, 53 N. E. 685, was an authority requiring them to now hold the other way.

Now the difficulty here is that the relator in the last-cited case was a foreign corporation, while the relator sub judice was a domestic one. The statutes through a long series of enactments imposed the tax of the character involved upon the franchise or business of domestic corporations and foreign ones doing business within the state, measuring it by the amount of capital stock employed within the state. The New York cases involving these statutes are crowded with declarations to the effect that this tax is a tax upon the franchises of domestic corporations and only upon the business which foreign ones are privileged to do in the state, since the franchises of the latter are beyond the jurisdiction. See remarks of Earl, J., at pp. 393, 394, in People v. Equitable Trust Co. 96 N. Y. 387; of O'Brien, J., pp. 68, 69, in People ex rel. Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wemple, 131 N. Y. 64, 29 N. E. 1002; of Gray, J., pp. 74, 75, and Vann, J., p. 85, in People ex rel. A. J. Johnson Co. v. Roberts, 159 N. Y. 70, 45 L. R. A. 126, 53 N. E. 685. of Putnam, J., in People ex rel. Postal Telegraph Cable Co. v. Campbell, 70 Hun, 507, 24 N. Y. Supp. 208: in quoting from People ex rel. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Wemple, 138 N. Y. 1, 19 L. R. A. 694, 33 N. E. 720; Gray, J., p. 563, in People ex rel. American Contracting & Dredging Co. v. Wemple, 129 N. Y. 558, 29 N. E. 812; and in People ex rel. Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik v. Roberts, 152 N. Y. 59, 36 L. R. A. 756, 46 N. E. 161; and Bartlett, J., p. 591, in People ex rel. United Verde Copper Co. v. Roberts, 156 N. Y. 585, 51 N. E. 293.

This discrimination somewhat differentiates the Johnson Case, and makes the assumption very dubious that it was intended in effect to overrule the Home Insurance Company Case. It does not dispose of the matter to cite, as well, People ex rel. Edison Electric Illum. Co. v. Brooklyn Bd. of Assessors, 156 N. Y. 417, 42 L. R. A. 290, 51 N. E. 269, since that involved local taxes upon capital stock which, as is elsewhere pointed out, does not include franchises. And finally, it may be said that the Johnson Case goes no further than to hold that copyrights belonging to a foreign corporation form no part of the capital employed within the state, and since that is the basis of the tax they cannot be included in the computation.

50 cents on each $100 of such property for public schools, and also to impose a penalty not exceeding 25 per centum of the amount of its tax bill for failure to pay same on or before the 1st of November of the year in which they were made out; that, under the provisions of said act, said board of council may list or assess for taxation all property subject to taxation, if such property, for any reason, has not been listed or assessed by this defendant's town assessor; that on the 20th of June, 1894, the clerk of the Campbell county court certified to this defendant's board of council that the state board of valuation and assessment had fixed the value of plaintiff's franchise, within the corporate limits of this defendant's town, at $18,674.71 for the purpose of taxation, and that said board of valuation and assessment had fixed the value of plaintiff's franchise in this defendant's town at $18,674.71, for the purposes of taxation by this defendant, and for purposes of taxation by this state; that, after the receipt of said certificate, the board of council listed said franchise for ad valorem taxation at the sum aforesaid, and entered and listed said franchise property upon the books of its town assessor for taxation, and directed the clerk of this defendant town to make out its bill in accordance therewith; that on the 20th of June, 1894, the said board of council duly passed an order providing for the levy and collection of an ad valorem tax for the year 1894 upon all real, personal, and mixed property within the corporate limits of the town as listed or assessed by the assessor. The answer further sets out all the technical steps required by law, as well as alleging the amount of property owned by appel-

e. Taxes on passenger traffic.

Attempts have been made from time to time to impose state taxes upon carriers of passengers, but they have usually proved abortive. These laws commonly infringed the commerce clause of the United States Constitution, and were adjudged void for that reason. A brief reference only to this class of cases is made here for the sake of continuity. They are discussed in a separate note on corporate taxation as affected by the commerce clause in the Federal Constitution.

The supreme court of New Jersey held valid a law of that state which laid upon foreign corporations doing business therein and transporting passengers and merchandise across the state to and from other states a special tax graduated by the number of passengers and the weight of goods carried (State v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 30 N. J. L. 478); but other cases, with substantial unanimity, have held the efforts hitherto made by states to tax passenger traffic futile. The Passenger Cases—*Smith v. f. Taxes on receipts, income, etc.

1. Corporations engaged in interstate or foreign commerce.

As the whole subject of corporate taxation as affected by the commerce clause of the United States Constitution is reserved for treatment in a separate note, an exhaustive discussion under this head must not be looked for here. It is generally agreed that the gross receipts of corporations which happen to be engaged in foreign or interstate commerce, in so far as they are exclusively derived from commercial transactions that begin, continue, and end within the territory ruled by the taxing government, are subject to taxation by that government. There is practically such an agreement that the receipts from commerce which both begins and ends outside of such territory are beyond the reach of such taxation. And the great weight of authority is to the effect that commerce which either commences or terminates outside that territory renders the receipts from it not taxable within it. Northwestern P. R. Co. v. Raymond, 5 Dak. 356, 1 L. R. A. 732, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 321, 40 N. W. 538; Northern P. R. Co. v. Barnes, 2 N. D. 310, 51 N. W. 386; *State ex rel. Carr v. Woodruff Sleeping & P. These general rules are conspicuously illustrated by the litigation between the state of New York and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. The first attempt to tax that corporation under the franchise or business tax acts failed because the business it carried on was exclusively interstate commerce. People ex rel. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Wemple, 138 N. Y. 1, 19 L. R. A. 694, 33 N. E. 720.

But when it established a cab service to lant, and the purpose for which the various taxes were levied. Copies of said ordinances are filed with the answer.

To the foregoing answer, appellant filed its demurrer, which was overruled by the court; and, no further steps being taken by the appellant, its petition was dismissed, and the injunction dissolved, and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted. We copy as follows from the opinion of the court on the demurrer to the answer:

"The question now presented to the court is whether the town of Bellevue can levy an ad valorem tax on the valuation of plaintiff's franchise. Section 174 of the Constitution provides that all property, whether owned by natural persons or corporation, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, unless exempted by this Constitution; and all corporate property shall pay the same rate of taxation paid by individual property. Nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to prevent the general assembly from providing for taxation based on income, licenses, or franchises. And § 181 also provides: 'The general assembly may, by general laws only, provide for the payment of license fees on franchises, stock used for breeding purposes, the various trades, occupations, and professions, or a special or excise tax; and may, by general laws, delegate the power to counties, towns, cities, and other municipal corporations, to impose and collect license fees on stock used for breeding purposes, on franchises, trades, occupations, and professions.' That the state can collect an ad valorem tax on franchises was decided by the court of appeals in the case of Henderson Bridge Co. v. Com. 99 Ky. 623, 29 L. R. A. 73, 31 S. W. 486. Section transport actual or prospective passengers in the city of New York between its terminal at the ferry to New Jersey and their homes, hotels, or other points of arrival and departure, charging an independent separate cab-fare therefor, it was held subject to taxation in respect of its receipts from such cab service under the New York statute (Laws 1896, chap. 908, § 184) providing for the taxation of railroad and other transportation companies for the privilege of exercising corporate franchises or of carrying on business in a corporate or organized capacity by an annual license fee or excise tax equal to $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent upon their gross earnings from transportation or transmission business originating and terminating within the state, but not including earnings derived from business of an interstate character. People ex rel. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Knight, 171 N. Y. 354, 64 N. E. 152, Affirming 67 App. Div. 398, 73 N. Y. Supp. 790.

The case of Western U. Tele. Co. v. State Bd. of Assessment, 80 Ala. 273, 60 Am. Rep. 99, affirming the power of a state to tax receipts from not only telegraph messages received and delivered at points within the state, but those received within it for transmission and delivery without its territory, was reversed on error by the United States Supreme Court. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Alabama State Bd. of Assessment, 132 U. S. 473, sub nom. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Seay, 33 L. ed. 409, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 726, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 161.

The cases of United States Exp. Co. v. Ellyson, 28 Iowa, 370, and Western U. Tele. Co. v. Ellyson, 28 Iowa, 380, are unique. The Iowa statute therein involved enacted that the property of all express or telegraph companies operating in the state should be included in the valuation of their personal property in the respective political communities where they had business offices, and that they should be assessed at the same rate as other personal property belonging to individuals. It proceeded to make it the duty of the agents of such companies to furnish the local assessors, annually between stated dates, sworn statements of the gross receipts of their respective offices; and thereupon it directed the assessors to deduct from such receipts 60 per cent to represent expenses, and to return the remaining 40 per cent as the value of the personal property of the corporations to be assessed at the same rate as the personal property of individuals. This the court held unaffected by the commerce clause, as the law merely subjected local property to taxation. There was no provision for ascertaining whether or not there was, apart from the receipts any personal property of the companies, or what it consisted of, or its value; no thought or care of the source of the receipts, nor what the expenses actually were; just a bald allowance of 60 per cent for expenses and a declaration that 40 per cent of the receipts constituted local personal property subject to the tax.

When both terminal points are within a state, the receipts from commerce between them are rightly held subject to state taxation although in the course of the journey the state is departed from and re-entered. Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 21 W. N. C. 410; Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Com. (Pa.) 1 L. R. A. 232, note; Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 145 U. S. 192, 36 L. ed. 672, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 87, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 806.

If the tax laid upon a corporation engaged in interstate commerce is seen to be clearly and beyond controversy a franchise tax, to levy which the gross receipts are merely resorted to as a standard to measure the value of the franchise, it is, of course, just as valid as if the standard taken was something else.

Thus, a statute imposing a specific tax on express companies according to their gross receipts from current business in the state, even when applied to a foreign carrier engaged in general commerce among the several states, is valid. Walcott v. People, 17 Mich. 68.

So is a tax imposed by way of license upon a foreign pipeline company of a percentage of the gross receipts from transporting oil in the state, apportioned according to mileage. Tide Water Pipe Co. v. State Bd. of Assessors, 57 N. J. L. 516, 27 L. R. A. 684, 31 Atl. 220.

And a tax upon the corporate franchise or business of transportation companies doing business in the state, of a fraction of 1 per cent upon their gross earnings in the state from tolls, for express, transportation, telegraph, and telephone business, may include as part of the basis of computation, not only receipts from internal commerce, but also those apportioned to the domestic constituent of a consolidated company as its share from interstate and foreign transactions. People ex rel. Dunkirk, A. Valley & P. R. Co. v. Campbell, 74 Hun. 210, 26 N. Y. Supp. 832.

And a tax upon the gross receipts from telegraphing during the year preceding its assessment is held to be a franchise tax, and not one on the telegrams sent or received, and therefore to be valid. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Mayer, 28 Ohio St. 521.

It is when the tax is laid upon gross receipts eo nomine, so that it is not always possible to say with certainty that it is a fran-

174, above quoted, applies alike to the state and every taxing subdivision of it; and § 181 authorizes the same license fees to be collected by counties, towns, cities, etc., as is done by the state, except an excise or income tax. So that, if § 181 is a limitation on § 174 as to cities, as counsel for plaintiff contends, it is also a limitation as to the state for the same reason; but it is not either. A franchise is property, and it must, under the Constitution, pay the same rate of taxation paid by other property. Stock used for breeding purposes is assessed, and an ad valorem tax is paid, and, in addition thereto, a license fee is charged by the state, and is paid, and the right to both has not, and cannot be, successfully questioned. There is no good reason why, under the provision of the Constitution quoted, a town or city having legislative authority may not both collect an ad valorem tax on the value of the franchise, and a license fee for the use of the franchise. The defendant seeks to collect an ad valorem tax on the assessed value of plaintiff's franchise. These views, the court believes, are in accord with the reason of the chief justice in the case of Levi v. Louisville, 97 Ky. 394, 28 L. R. A. 480, 30 S. W. 973."

It seems to us that the charter of the town of Bellevue, in May, 1892, at the time the alleged contract was executed, prohibited the appellee from making the contract claimed by the appellant; and, besides, the chise tax measured by receipts rather than an impost on the receipts themselves, that confusion arises.

In the famous case of the State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 284, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 164, the ruling was that a state statute imposing, in addition to other legal taxes, a percentage tax upon the gross receipts of every domestic railroad, canal, and transportation company, not otherwise liable to an income tax, was not a tax upon freight or passengers carried, but one laid upon the corporation itself measured in amount by the extent of its business or the degree to which the franchise is exercised. That such a law was not open to the objection that it conflicted with the commerce clause because such receipts were partly derived from the carriage of persons and property to and from other states. The decision rested upon two distinct grounds: First, that the receipts from freight carried had passed into the treasury of the company and thereby lost their distinctive character,—that, the commerce from which they were derived having altogether ended, what it had produced had become general property and as such subject to taxation as much as if its source was otherwise; second, that the tax was a franchise tax laid upon the company merely measured by the sum of the receipts. At the outset three of the judges, Miller, Field, and Hunt, went on record in dissent. They took the ground that the case was indistinguishable in principle from the case between the same parties just disposed of the other way (State Freight Tax Case, 15 Wall. 232, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 146), which held that a state tax upon the freight or tonnage of a domestic railroad corporation was a regulation of commerce and could not stand. They argued that a tax on freight, being because of the commerce clause without the power of the state to impose a tax on the receipts from freight, was not within it. To hold the contrary was to "keep the word of promise to the ear, and break it to the hope."

"It was at once felt," says a later authority, "that the distinction thus drawn between freight and the money paid for carrying freight was unsound in principle and that the [last] decision must soon be overruled." Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Com. 1 Monaghan, 26, 1 L. R. A. 232, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 222, 17 Atl. 175.

The next case to come before the Supreme Court upon the same general question,—Delaware Railroad Tax, 18 Wall. 206, sub nom. Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 21 L. ed. 888,—did not affect the controversy thus begun, because of the material differences in 57 L. R. A.

the statute there involved. That law required all domestic railroad and canal corporations doing business in the taxing state annually to pay a state tax, in addition to other taxes, of 3 per cent on their net earnings or income from all sources during the year, with a proviso that when the canal or railroad extended into an adjoining state only so much of the net earnings or income as was proportioned to the length of the line within the state should be subject to the tax. The act also imposed a further tax of $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent on the actual cash value of every share of the capital stock of such corporations, with a similar proviso for an apportionment, in which the factors were the whole number of shares, the total length of the line, and the mileage within the state. And lastly, it laid a specific tax upon each locomotive, passenger coach, truck, and freight car used within the state. This law was sustained.

The Pennsylvania courts, of course, upheld the act of their own state taxing the gross receipts of domestic railroads from freights passing through the state coming from or going to other states. Com. v. Buffalo & E. R. Co. 2 Pearson (Pa.) 376; Buffalo & E. R. Co. v. Com. 3 Brewst. (Pa.) 386.

In the latter case it was said that the law must be considered as settled until reviewed and changed by the Supreme Court of the United States, which the court plainly contemplated, since it added: We concede that there is no difference between the tax charged on the freight as claimed here and on the goods as decided in the previous cases, but the point is negatived without qualification in obedience to those decisions.

Then the supreme court of Michigan was called upon to pass on the validity of a statute of that state whereby every person, association, partnership, or corporation owning, running, or interested in any special, fast, through, or other stock, coal, or refrigerator car freight lines, the cars of which were not the exclusive property of the railroads over which they run, and which did business in, or run cars upon, railroads in Michigan, was required to keep accounts and make reports of all sums received for business in that state, and to pay a state tax annually thereon of a percentage of the gross receipts as computed by the state railroad commissioner. A tax laid pursuant to this statute upon a foreign joint-stock association sending freight into and through the state in its own cars for its own patrons under contracts with the railroad companies was contested for repugnancy to the commerce clause, but held valid by the state court. Fargo v. Auditor General, 57 Mich. 598, 24 N. W. 538.

This case was promptly carried to the Unit-new Constitution was then in full force, which would also seem to prohibit the making of any such contract; and, for the two reasons, the contract, even if it attempted to exempt the value of appellant's franchise from taxation, would be null and void. But we are further of the opinion that a fair construction of the contract only exempts the appellant from the payment of a license tax or fee proper; that is a specific tax for the privilege, without regard to its value. Section 4077 of the Kentucky Statutes does not levy a tax for such purpose, but merely fixes a basis for determining the value of certain franchises; and it is wholly immaterial, so far as this action is concerned, whether the town authorities of Bellevue were bound to adopt the state valuation as the value of the franchise for city taxation or not. But, as matter of law, the valuation by the state board of the property was, in law, conclusive as to its value for city assessment. It appears from the answer that the city authorities, under and by virtue of the law, did assess and value the franchise at the sum named therein, and assessed the tax provided by law. We think the reasons of the court below, as shown by the quotations from its opinions copied herein, are sustained by the law.

ed States Supreme Court on writ of error, where the judgment was reversed. It was there held that a state tax on the gross receipts of a foreign express company derived from transportation of merchandise into, out of, or through the state, and not wholly internal, was void by reason of the commerce clause. Fargo v. Michigan, 121 U. S. 230, sub nom. Fargo v. Stevens, 30 L. ed. 888, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 51, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 857.

It is obvious that it could not be said in such a case that the tax rested upon money that had ceased to be commerce and become property, since it never came within the jurisdiction of Michigan,—never entered that state at all,—so that this contention would not support the tax. If upheld at all, it must be sustained as a franchise tax; but clearly Michigan has no more jurisdiction over the foreign franchise than she has over foreign property. But the decision went beyond this. Miller, J., writing for the court, after discussing the State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 284, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 164, says: The proposition that the states can, by way of a tax upon business transacted within their limits or upon the franchises of corporations which they have chartered, regulate such business or the affairs of such corporations has often been set up as a defense to the allegation that the taxation was such an interference with commerce as violated the constitutional provision now under consideration. But where the business so taxed is commerce itself, and is commerce among the states or with foreign nations, the constitutional provision cannot thereby be evaded, nor can the states, by granting franchises to corporations engaged in the business of the transportation of persons or merchandise among them, which is itself interstate commerce, acquire the right to regulate that commerce, either by taxation, or in any other way.

About this time the supreme court of Pennsylvania decided that a domestic corporation with its head office in that state, owning seagoing ships employed in coasting and foreign ocean trade between its home port and the ports of other states and countries on voyages over the navigable waters of the United States and upon the high seas, whose vessels were registered under Federal navigation acts, while its entire receipts came from the carriage of freight and passengers between the different ports referred to, was subject to a state tax upon its gross receipts notwithstanding the commerce clause of the United States Constitution. Philadelphia & S. Mail SS. Co. v. Com. 104 Pa. 109.

In affirming the validity of this tax the court argued that it was laid upon the money of the 57 L. R. A.

carrier after it reached the corporate treasury, and it was immaterial where it came from, as the state had a right to tax its own corporations upon the fruits of their business brought within its jurisdiction and made a part of the general mass of the commonwealth.

When this case reached the United States Supreme court, as in due course it soon did, Bradley, J., writing in his opening sentence pronounced the question presented by it for decision to be: "Whether a state can constitutionally impose upon a steamship company incorporated under its laws a tax upon the gross receipts of such company derived from the transportation of persons and property by sea between different states and to and from foreign countries." And his final conclusion was "that the imposition of the tax in question in this cause was a regulation of interstate and foreign commerce in conflict with the exclusive powers of Congress under the Constitution." Philadelphia & S. Mail SS. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326, 336, 30 L. ed. 1200, 1201, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 308, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1118. In the course of his opinion the learned justice reasons thus: If, then, the commerce carried on by the plaintiff in error in this case could not be constitutionally taxed by the state, could the freights and fares received for carrying on that commerce be constitutionally taxed? If the state cannot tax the transportation, may it nevertheless tax the fares and freights received therefor? Where is the difference? Looking at the substance of things, and not at mere forms, it is very difficult to see any difference. The one thing seems to be tantamount to the other. It would seem to be rather metaphysics than plain logic for the state officials to say to the company, we will not tax you for the transportation you perform, but we will tax you for what you get for performing it. Such a position can hardly be said to be based on a sound method of reasoning. Turning to the decision of the Case of State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 284, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 164, he says that a review of the question has convinced the court that the first ground, to wit: that the receipts from the freight carried had passed into the general property of the company and lost their distinctive character, upon which the decision in that case was placed, is not tenable. The second ground upon which that decision rested, he takes up in relation to the case at bar, and thus disposes of: It certainly could not have been intended as a tax on the corporate franchise, because by the terms of the act it was laid equally on the corporations of other states doing business in Pennsylvania. If intended as a tax on the franchise of doing business,—which in this case is the

The two cases of Fargo v. Michigan, 121 U. S. 230, sub nom. Fargo v. Stevens, 30 L. ed. 888, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 51, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 857, and *Philadelphia & S. Mail SS. Co. v. Rep. 1118, were thereupon generally considered to have overruled The State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 284, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 164, and to have finally settled the law (see Rutland R. Co. v. Central Vermont R. Co. 63 Vt. 1, 10 L. R. A. 562, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 488, 21 Atl. 262, 731; also Raney, Ch. J., in Osborne v. State, 33 Fla. 162, 25 L. R. A. 120, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 731, 14 So. 588); and the courts of Pennsylvania gracefully acquiesced. Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Com. 1 Monaghan, 36, 1 L. R. A. 232, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 222, 17 Atl. 175, 21 W. N. C. 406, overruling, in conformity therewith, their former decisions in Philadelphia & S. Mail SS. Co. v. Com. 104 Pa. 109; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Com. 107 Pa. 148; and Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Com. 110 Pa. 405, 20 Atl. 720; and holding the contrary in Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 21 W. N. C. 410; Com. v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 21 W. N. C. 412.

But the controversy was not ended. Maine enacted a statute providing that every corporation, person, or association operating a railroad in that state should pay to the state an annual excise tax for the privilege of exercising railroad franchises in such state, the amount of such tax being ascertained by dividing the gross receipts from transportation during the preceding year by the number of miles of railroad operated to get the average gross market or actual value, less certain specified deductions.

2. The personal property referred to in item 7 is the tangible property specifically listed and assessed, and does not include "franchises." Item 14 of § 1524, Gen. Stat. 1894, providing for listing "franchises" as a separate and distinct class of personal property, applies only to private persons, or others not falling within the provisions of § 1530. The provision in § 1530 for deducting the total amount of the indebtedness of a corporation or association from the value of its stock is unconstitutional, because resulting in inequality of taxation. But the invalidity of this provision does not render the remainder of the section invalid.

3. Certain irregularities of the county board and county auditor in increasing the assessed value of items 18 and 27 of personal property, and in extending it on the assessment rolls,—Held not to have prejudiced the defendants; it not appearing that, as thus increased, either item was overvalued. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 1669, providing for the taxation of railroad companies by requiring them to pay a percentage on their gross earnings, does not apply to street railroads.

receipts per mile and then taking a percentage of such receipts, larger or smaller according as they fell short of or exceeded certain stated sums. In the case of railroads operating partly within and partly without the state the gross receipts were to be apportioned upon consideration of both totals and averages and mileage within the state and in toto. The state court held this statute repugnant to the commerce clause as applied to the Grand Trunk Railway, a foreign corporation carrying on interstate and international commerce, and the attorney general carried the case to the United States Supreme Court. That tribunal, speaking through Field, J., one of the dissentients in the case of State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 284, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 164, held the tax a valid one as a true franchise tax, which was merely measured by a proportion of the gross receipts, and, being such, it was of no consequence where the receipts used as a standard came from,—they were not taxed. No cases were cited to sustain this conclusion, except the then recent one of Home Ins. Co. v. New York, 134 U. S. 594, 33 L. ed. 1023, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 593, in which was upheld a franchise tax imposed by New York upon a corporation of its own creation, not engaged in commerce of any kind, measured by its capital stock when a part of such capital stock stood invested in United States bonds. And the prevailing opinion closed with the statement that the case of Philadelphia & S. Mail SS. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326, 30 L. ed. 1200, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 308, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1118, in no way conflicted with this decision. "We do not," it was added, "question the correctness of that decision, nor do the views we hold in this case in any way qualify or impair it." Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217,

QUESTIONS certified by the District Court for St. Louis County which arose in actions brought to enforce collection of personal taxes against the defendant corporations. Judgment in favor of the State directed with certain exceptions.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles C. Teare, George E. Arbury, and William B. Phelps for the State.

Messrs. Billson, Congdon, & Dickinson, for Duluth Street Railway Company:

The clause authorizing a deduction of the corporate debts was intended by the legislature to authorize a deduction of debts from the value of corporate franchises, just as, in the case of individuals, debts may be deducted from credits.

The statute would remain, after a loss of this clause, as complete, symmetrical, and harmonious as it could have been with it; nor is there any reason to suppose that the legislature would have changed in other respects its scheme of taxation if it had foreseen the invalidity of this particular clause.

In the cases at bar there could not have been in any event a deduction of debts, because there is no stock value to deduct from; all the corporations being insolvent, and their stock of no value whatever.

Even with the obnoxious clause dropped out, no element of franchise value can be found in the stock of any of these companies.

It was not through caprice that the legislature directed that this residuum of value should be listed as "stocks."

It was as, and in the form of, "stocks" that it was intended to subject this residuary value of taxation.

3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 163.

From this decision four judges, Bradley, Harlan, Lamar, and Brown, JJ., the first writing, dissented. Conceding, they said in substance, that a state has the power to exact from a foreign corporation a tax for the privilege of exercising corporate franchises within its borders, yet it cannot adopt an unconstitutional mode of doing so. They insisted that the mode adopted in the case at bar was the laying of a tax on gross receipts the major part of which came from foreign and interstate commerce, and therefore the tax was laid on that commerce, and was for that reason void. They insisted that the decision was a plain departure from the following line of decisions: Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 34, 29 L. ed. 785, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 635; Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 32 L. ed. 311, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 134, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1380; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S. 114, 34 L. ed. 394, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 178, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 958; Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, 35 L. ed. 640, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 851; Philadelphia & S. Mail SS. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326, 30 L. ed. 1200, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 308, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1118. They express themselves vigorously. They declare that the Supreme Court, and some of the state courts, have gone to a great length in sustaining corporate taxation. That the train of reasoning may be questionable. That, according to this class of decisions, a corporation may be taxed several times over,—for its charter, franchises, for the privilege of carrying on its business, upon its capital, and upon its property; and that each of these taxations may be carried to the full amount of the property of the company. Adverting to the decision that a tax in terms upon the capital stock of the Western Union Telegraph Company in Massachusetts, graduated according to mileage of the lines within that state as compared with the total mileage, was but a taxation of the property of the company within the state although laid upon capital stock; and that it as well might have been laid on gross receipts; and that by this decision a tax may be laid upon gross receipts of a corporation for the privilege of exercising its franchise within the taxing state if graduated according to mileage,—they say: "Then it comes to this: A state may tax a railroad company upon its gross receipts in proportion to the number of miles run within the state as a tax on its property; and may also lay a tax upon these same gross receipts in proportion to the same number of miles for the privilege of exercising its franchise." The 57 L. R. A.

dissent closes thus: "I do not know what else it may not tax the gross receipts for. If the interstate commerce of the country is not, or will not be, handicapped by this course of decision, I do not understand the ordinary principles which govern human conduct."

Notwithstanding, the views expressed by Peckham, J., writing for the court in McHenry v. Alford, 168 U. S. 651, 670, 671, 42 L. ed. 614, 621, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 242, practically conceding that a state tax on railway gross receipts derived wholly or partly from interstate commerce would be void for conflict with the commerce clause of the United States Constitution, the whole contest is again open.

Thus, the Maryland court of appeals has just decided (February 20, 1901) that a statute of that state imposing a state tax of 1 per cent upon the gross receipts of all domestic steam railroad corporations doing business therein, and upon those whose lines extend beyond the state the same rate per cent upon such proportion of their gross earnings as their mileage within the state bears to the entire length of the line, imposes a franchise tax upon domestic corporations measured merely by the extent of the receipts, and therefore the source of such receipts, as from interstate commerce, is immaterial, and does not affect the validity of the tax. Cumberland & P. R. Co. v. State, 92 Md. 668, 52 L. R. A. 764, 48 Atl. 503.

The opinion of the court in that case, by Pearce, J., is an elaborate argument to show that the case of the State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 284, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 164, was not overruled by Fargo v. Michigan, 121 U. S. 230, sub nom. Fargo v. Stevens, 30 L. ed. 888, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 51, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 857, and Philadelphia & S. Mail SS. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326, 30 L. ed. 1200, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 308, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1118, as has so often been asserted; at any rate, if such can justly be claimed, that it was reclothed with authority by the subsequent decision in Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 163. Apart from this, he contends that the first of these cases was sound in principle anyway.

Thus the question remains. The series of decisions cannot be wholly reconciled, and those upon one side or the other must in time be positively and finally declared unsound.

2. Railroad, steamship, navigation, express, and telegraph companies generally.

Apart from the question of interstate com-

The legislature had its option as to the form in which this residuary element of value should be taxed. It has chosen to tax it as "stocks." It cannot at the same time tax the "stocks," and the underlying franchises or other value of which the stock is another form.

When the legislature elected to pursue the franchise value in the form of stocks, the tax must manifestly stand or fall, according as the stocks have or have not actual value.

A corporation, which is, and for many years last past has been, duly organized and existing under title 1 of chap. 34, Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, and the acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto; and the general nature of whose business was and is to construct, maintain, and operate railways in the streets and highways of the city of Duluth, and its suburbs, including Lakeside, Lester Park, West Duluth, and New Duluth, and in the roads connecting the same in St. Louis county, Minnesota, upon which the right so to do may be acquired by such corporation, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise; and which during the years 1894 and 1895 owned and operated a passenger railway line 16 miles in length in the streets of the city of Duluth, and along the rights of way acquired by it by purchase and condemnation; and which has been declared by the legislature of the state of Minnesota to be "a corporation organized and existing under the general railroad law of this state,"—is a railroad corporation within the meaning of § 1, chap. 11, of the General Laws of 1887, so as to be taxable as therein described.

The statute providing for the taxation of merce, the courts have frequently had occasion to express themselves concerning taxes on corporate receipts.

The various phases in which cases have been presented do not readily admit of systematic grouping.

A tax on gross earnings payable in installments may be discharged by a single payment before all but the first accrues. Northern P. R. Co. v. Raymond, 5 Dak. 358, 1 L. R. A. 732, 2 Intera. Com. Rep. 321, 40 N. W. 538.

A charter provision that a railroad and its property shall not be subject to a higher tax than a stated percentage on its annual income, permits the taxation of gross earnings from the business of the line, not net income only, nor rental from a lease of the road. Goldsmith v. Augusta & S. E. Co. 62 Ga. 468.

Whether or not a statute imposing upon a domestic railroad an obligation to pay the state a fixed proportion of the passenger fares it collects between two cities on its line in consideration of the grant of a franchise to build and operate it and collect fares and tolls therein is void for conflicting with the constitutional right of citizens of the Union to pass through or depart from the state because in effect a capitation tax, it is no defense to a suit by the state for its share after the railroad has actually collected the fares for the use of the state. State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 34 Md. 374.

When this case reached the Supreme Court the decision was affirmed, but this proposition was not agreed to. It was there said that the doctrine that the part of the fares which the company's charter obliged it to pay the state was state money which the company was agent to collect, and which it held in trust for the state, and was bound to pay over irrespective of the constitutionality of the statute, had no application. The court did say that, inasmuch as a state has the right to build transportation lines and to authorize individuals or bodies corporate so to do and has an unlimited right in its discretion to charge tolls, freights, and fares, and to authorize its delegates or grantees so to do, it can, in either case, constitutionally take any part or any class of the receipts that it and its grantee or creature may agree upon. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Maryland, 21 Wall. 456, 22 L. ed. 678. Miller, J., however, dissented upon the ground that the case was within the principle of Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall. 35, 18 L. ed. 745.

One state cannot constitutionally tax the entire gross receipts of a consolidated railroad corporation operating in several states and made up of constituent corporations chartered by different states. Its power in this respect is limited to the gains within its own territory. State Treasurer v. Auditor General, 46 Mich. 224, 9 N. W. 258.

Under a statute laying an annual tax upon the gross receipts per mile of all roads actually and regularly operated by domestic railroad companies in lieu of all other taxes except on real estate capable of alienation and not essential to the exercise of their franchises, and providing that when a railroad lies partly within and partly without the state there shall be paid such a portion of the thereby imposed tax as the length of the road within the state bears to the whole length of the operated portion thereof, a corporation formed by the consolidation of domestic and foreign companies operating lines both within and without the state, some owned and others leased in perpetuity, is taxable upon the gross receipts of the domestic railroads in the consolidation, and not upon the proportionate mileage basis. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Auditor General, 58 Mich. 79, 18 N. W. 588.

Advances made by a foreign railroad corporation to domestic roads in its system of lines to pay interest on the latter's debts, and in consideration of a traffic agreement and promise of repayment constitute no part of the taxable earnings of the recipients. Re Taxation of Grand Trunk R. Co. 6 Det. L. N. No. 18, Atty. Gen.'s Op. 348a.

In computing the miles of railroad operated by a union railroad station company in order to tax the gross income per mile, separate tracks should be treated as main lines, and their aggregate mileage returned; but this does not mean that where a single track is used by two companies the length should be doubled; nor that each of two tracks exclusively used by one company should be measured; nor that switches be regarded as additional track; but that there should be measured a line for each railroad entering the depot, provided there are as many tracks as roads no two of which are used exclusively by any one road. Fort Smith Union Depot Co. v. Railroad Comrs. 118 Mich. 340, 76 N. W. 631.

Tracks over which a railroad runs trains, but which it does not exclusively control, are not counted for the purpose of computing a tax upon its gross income per mile of road actually operated within the state. Detroit, G. R. & W. R. Co. v. Railroad Comrs. 119 Mich. 132, 77 N. W. 631.

Sums received for switching, rentals of approaches, tracks and terminals, and interest on money deposits are part of the gross income.

gross earnings extends to all railroad companies.

Messrs. Washburn, Lewis, & Bailey, for other defendants:

It may well be questioned whether such a license as this, from a municipality, to allow pipes and mains to be laid in and under the streets and alleys of a town, is a franchise at all, within the meaning and intentment of the statute; and whether it could ever be subject to be taxed as a property item.

When a railroad charter provides for the payment of a percentage of the gross earnings in lieu of all taxes and assessment, payments to commence as soon as a certain number of miles of the road shall be completed; and the company has the power to divide its lines and franchises so that several distinct and separate railroads may be created under the exclusive ownership and control, respectively, of independent corporations possessed of like franchises, and exercises such power, a successor acquiring one of such railroads becomes liable to the tax as soon as the requisite number of miles are completed on any one of the original lines, regardless of whether such mileage is completed upon its own particular road or not. *Chicago, M. & St. P. An ordinance of a state constitutional convention adopted as part of the fundamental law providing for the levy upon and collection from certain railroad companies of an annual percentage tax upon their gross receipts from fares and freights (less those from the United States, and deducting Federal taxes) does not contravene the 5th and 6th Amendments to the United States Constitution, since these merely limit the powers of the general government, and have no application to states. *North Missouri R. A corporation organized to make a complete slack-water communication between a designated city and the state line, and authorized to collect tolls upon every ton of freight transported upon its works, but forbidden in express terms to engage directly or indirectly in transporting or storing merchandise, etc., though certainly no transportation company, is none the less within a statute imposing a specified tax upon the gross receipts of every railroad, canal, and transportation company liable to a tonnage tax under another section in the same statute, which does in positive terms include it, when it is plain that the two sections are so intimately blended as to require being construed together, and that the phrase "transportation company" is a mere collective name to designate the companies other than railroads and canals within the tonnage tax section. Com. v. Monongahela Nav. Co. 66 Pa. 81.

The court below in a much more logical and direct opinion had held the company not within the statute. It would have been better to leave it to the legislature to bring it in by amendment. It is certainly safer to leave tax legislation to the legislature, which is usually prompt to tax everything in sight, especially corporations.

Sumas called rentals are really tolls within a statute imposing a specific tax upon the gross receipts of railroad companies when paid to a foreign railroad for use of a part of its line, a branch road wholly within the state, by its lessee for carrying coal, merchandise, and passengers, both between points within the state, and from them to points beyond its borders. *Com. v. These points in the foregoing Pennsylvania cases are, of course, unaffected by the rulings before referred to respecting the same taxes in relation to interstate commerce.

brought to enforce the collection of personal taxes) being essentially the same, it will be sufficient to state those in the case against the Duluth Gas & Water Company.

This is a domestic corporation organized to manufacture gas for public and private consumption, and to furnish water to the inhabitants of the city of Duluth, which is its principal place of business. It is not, and never has been, the owner of any annuities, royalties, or patent rights; and the only franchise it has ever owned, except the franchise to be a corporation, is the right and privilege, under an ordinance of the city, to lay its pipes under and along the public streets of the city, and to maintain and operate the same for the purpose of furnishing gas and water for public and private consumption. Neither the company nor any of its officers listed its personal property for taxation during the year 1897, and it failed and refused to make any statement or return under either § 1524 or 1530, Gen. Stat. 1894. Thereupon the city assessor made and returned a statement of its personal property for taxation, and of his assessment and appraisal of the value thereof, on June 26, 1897, and filed the same in the office of the county auditor, whereby and wherein he listed and returned as personal property belonging to the company on May 1, 1897, the following (the return being made upon a blank of the form contained in § 1524, and the only items in the blank under which property was assessed being Nos. 1, 5, 10, 14, 18, and 27):

3. Miscellaneous corporations.

A corporation taxable upon its annual net earnings or income is subject to taxation upon the difference between expenses and receipts divided or divisible among its stockholders, whether dividends in form or not. It is not entitled to have such distributions to stockholders regarded as capital returned rather than profits either wholly or in part, merely because the capital is invested in oil wells tending to exhaustion. Com. v. Ocean Oil Co. 59 Pa. 61. And, to the same effect, Com. v. Penn Gas Coal Co. 62 Pa. 241, 3 Brewst. (Pa.) 107, in which the court expressed its inability to see that the former case did not govern.

4. Local taxes on receipts of local corporations.

The general power conferred upon a municipality to tax real and personal property, auction and other sales, and capital employed in business in the city, and to lay a street tax on the adult male inhabitants, is no authority for taxing the gross receipts of a warehouse company. Selma v. Selma Press & W. Co. 67 Ala. 430.

A street railway company subject to a municipal tax of a certain percentage of its receipts within the city that operates three lines 57 L. R. A.

The assessor never attempted to make any return of the property of the company pursuant to the provisions of § 1530 of the statutes; and in making the above return he did not take into consideration, or ascertain, the amount of the paid-up capital stock of the company, or its indebtedness; nor did he reach the amount by deducting the indebtedness of the company, exclusive of current expenses, from the capital stock, nor by deducting the indebtedness of the company, exclusive of current expenses, and the value of its real and personal property, from the actual or the market value of its stock, but put the valuation of said franchises upon his own estimate, as best he could, as though they were an item of tangible personal property. The assessment, return, and valuation as thus made by the assessor were not changed by the board of review of the city of Duluth. The authorized capital stock of the company was $1,000,000, and the amount of its paid-up capital stock was $679,050, but this had no value, either market or actual. The total indebtedness, except for current expenses, excluding from such expenses the amount paid for improvements on the property during the current year, was over $1,800,000. This indebtedness was in excess of the value of its real and personal property, and of its shares of stock. All the personal property which the company owned was included in the return of the assessor. In August, 1897, the county board of equalization raised the valuation of the personal property of the company $125,000, in a lump sum, determining by resolution that such an increase should be made on items Nos. 18 and with an aggregate car mileage of 8.63 miles, but, as part of its track is used in common, a track mileage of 7.08 of which half a mile is beyond the city limits, and that charges but one fare and gives a free transfer to each passenger, while not taxable upon so much of its receipts as come for carriage beyond the city, is entitled, when there is no way of classifying passengers or segregating fares, to credit for only so much of its gross receipts as its ultra-urban mileage bears to the total. Baltimore Union Pass. R. Co. v. Baltimore, 71 Md. 405, 18 Atl. 917.

Such a percentage tax upon the gross receipts of street railways for intermural fares imposed in consideration of the privilege or franchise to lay tracks and run cars upon the public thoroughfares, cannot be exacted from a railway corporation holding no franchise from the city, and running upon none of the city streets, but exclusively upon private property and a turnpike owned by a private corporation, although by an extension of the city limits a part of the line has been brought within the boundaries. Park Tax Case, 84 Md. 1, sub nom. Baltimore v. Baltimore, C. & E. M. Pass. R. Co. 33 L. E. A. 506, 35 Atl. 17.

Sums devoted to redeeming bonds issued to pay for a street railway franchise are no part of the running expenses which are to be deducted from the gross receipts as the basis for taxing such franchise. State ex rel. St. Charles Street R. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 48 La. Ann. 1156, 20 So. 670.

Authority given a city to tax all goods, wares, merchandise, and articles of commerce sold in it, at auction or otherwise; to tax retail liquor

27, but not apportioning the increase between the two; and thereupon the county auditor, without any other or more specific authority from the county board, added $43,750 to item 18, and $81,250 to item 27. The board of equalization made this increase without any evidence being introduced upon which to act, and without any examination of the property of the company at that time or for that purpose, and without examination or inquiry as to the amount of the company's indebtedness or the amount of its capital stock.

Upon this state of facts, the trial court has certified up two questions: (1) Were the franchises of the company hereinbefore described, to wit, to be a corporation, and to lay and maintain its pipes in the public streets of the city for the purpose of distributing and supplying water and gas, subject to taxation, as such, as a separate item of personal property, under the provisions of § 1524 of the statutes, or can it be reached for taxation only through assessments on the stock pursuant to the provisions of § 1530? (2) Was the increase on items 18 and 27, made in the manner above described, valid under the laws of this state?

Without stopping to discuss at length the whole scheme of taxation provided in our tax laws, an analysis and comparison of its various provisions satisfy us that the legislature intended § 1530, Gen. Stat. 1894, to be the exclusive method of listing and taxing the property of all corporations and companies falling within the purview of that section. That section nowhere provides for the listing and taxation of corporate franchises, as such, as a separate and distinct item of personal property. The method there provided for is the very common and most equitable and efficient one,—of reaching the franchises and other intangible property for purposes of taxation through the capital stock. The "capital stock" (using the term in the sense in which it is evidently used in this section) is, as has been said, "a business photograph of all the corporate possessions and possibilities," and represents its business opportunities and capacities as well as its tangible assets. They enter into, and go to make up, the value of the stock. It is well settled that these franchises, although neither visible nor tangible, are property which may be taxed the same as any other property. Hence a very common method of taxing corporations and stock companies is to list and assess all their tangible property, real and personal, the same as the like property of other persons is listed and assessed, and also list and assess the capital stock at its actual or market value, less the value of its tangible real and personal property otherwise specifically listed and assessed. This system reaches every element of property value owned by the corporation, and at the same time avoids double taxation. This is clearly the scheme of taxation contemplated and provided for by § 1530, with one exception, which will be considered hereafter. It is evident, in view of the entire scheme, that the value of the personal property in the seventh item, which is to be specifically listed and assessed, and deducted from the market or actual value of the shares of stock, refers solely to tangible personal dealers and auctioneers; to assess an annual business tax on the average quarterly business of forwarding and commission merchants, brokers, banks, and banking institutions; and a like tax on the average quarterly receipts of insurance, express, and telegraph companies,—does not warrant the imposition of a municipal tax on the gross receipts of city gas companies. This is so notwithstanding a later statute authorizing the city council, when raising revenue for current expenses and interest payments, to adjust the rate of taxation upon the different subjects then or afterwards made liable to taxation in such a manner as it may deem equitable, regardless of limitations and restrictions in former statutes, since this has not the effect to enlarge the number subject to the gross receipts or business taxes. Pittsburgh's Appeal, 1 Monaghan, 290, 18 Atl. 92.

g. Taxes on insurance premiums.

1. In general.

It is settled that insurance is not commerce; so the embarrassments that beset one in the effort to determine whether a tax upon the receipts of corporations engaged in commerce interferes with the exclusive power to regulate foreign, interstate, and Indian trade conferred upon Congress by the Federal Constitution do not arise in the investigation of taxes upon premiums of insurance.

The leading cases of Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357; Ducat v. Chicago, 10 Wall. 410, 19 L. ed. 972; and Liverpool & L. Life & F. Ins. Co. v. Massachusetts, 10 Wall. 566, sub 57 L. R. A.

nom. Liverpool & L. Life & F. Ins. Co. v. Oliver, 19 L. ed. 1029,—are conclusive upon this point.

Premiums received by an insurance company, not being property, but income, are not taxable by a municipality empowered only to tax property, and to license, regulate, and tax certain designated businesses, not including insurance. Dubuque v. Northwestern L. Ins. Co. 29 Iowa. 9; Burlington v. Putnam Ins. Co. 31 Iowa, 102.

Uncollected insurance premiums are not exempt in Louisiana. State ex rel. Mechanics' & T. Ins. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 47 La. Ann. 1498, 18 So. 1462.

When statutes lay a tax of a stated percentage upon all insurance premiums received in cash or otherwise, and all agreed to be paid, an insurance company liable thereto is bound to pay upon the aggregate premiums charged to its policy holders, although a part thereof is paid by crediting an excess of previous collections over the actual cost of insurance for the year of collection. People ex rel. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. State Treasurer, 31 Mich. 6.

It is held otherwise in Pennsylvania. It has been decided in that state that discounts from the face amounts of stipulated premiums when only the balance is actually paid by the policy holder to the company are no part of the receipts of the corporation within the meaning of the tax law of that state. And this is so even where the company calls the discounts dividends and credits the policy holder with the full premium, and charges him with property, and does not include franchises. It would be wholly unreasonable to assume that the legislature would adopt the scheme of reaching the franchises and other intangible property of a corporation through the taxation of its capital stock, and at the same time turn around and specifically tax as a separate item of personal property, and deduct from the value of the stock, the very intangible property which they were endeavoring to reach through the taxation of the stock. Sections 1524 and 1530 must be read and construed together; and, doing so, the 14th subdivision of the former section, providing for listing and assessing franchises as a specific and separate item of personal property, was intended to apply only to franchises owned by private persons or others not falling within the provisions of § 1530. Thus far there can be no constitutional objection to the system of taxation provided for in § 1530, and no question but that the franchises of these corporations were not intended to be made subject to taxation as a separate item of personal property, under § 1524, but only taxable through the assessment of the capital stock, pursuant to the provisions of § 1530. But in the latter section the legislature has gone a step further, and provided for the deduction from the value of the capital stock, not merely of the value of the tangible corporate property otherwise specifically taxed, but also the total amount of all indebtedness of the association, except indebtedness for current expenses. Such a provision is in direct conflict with the constitutional requirement that all taxes shall be as nearly equal as may be, and that all property on which taxes are to be levied shall the abatement upon its books. Com. v. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. 1 Dauph. Co. Rep. 233.

A section in a state revenue act taxing all insurance companies doing business in the state (except mutual ones without capital stock) upon the gross amount of premiums received in the state during the previous year, and freeing them from other taxes beyond those on real estate and fees to the insurance department, is fairly within the purview of a general act embracing, amid other subjects of taxation, all personal property and other investments, as well as property in transitu from the state controlled by residents, since it reaches premiums in the hands of local agents. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Omaha, 23 Neb. 312, 36 N. W. 522.

In New Jersey an insurance company is not liable to taxation on premiums received by its local superintendent and placed to his credit in a bank where every week he sends his total collections to the company, as this money is merely in transitu between policy holders and the insuring corporation. State, Metropolitan L. Ins. Co., Prosecutor, v. Newark, 62 N. J. L. 74, 40 Atl. 573.

A statute taxing insurance companies a specified percentage upon premiums received during six months before the first days of July and January in each year, and requiring semi-annual reports to be made after its enactment as the basis of assessing the tax, authorizes the first assessment to be made before the statute has been operative for six months and on account of premiums received prior to its passage. People v. National F. Ins. Co. 27 Hun, 188, Reversing 61 How. Pr. 334, 342.

Unearned premiums in the possession of the insurer are liable to taxation notwithstanding the right of the insured to a cancellation of his policy and the return of the part of the premium at any time on demand. People ex rel. Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. Davenport, 91 N. Y. 574.

A corporation formed to guarantee the fidelity of persons in public or private place of trust is an insurance company, and as such liable to pay a state percentage tax upon the gross premiums of all insurance companies except life and purely mutual beneficial associations. People ex rel. American Surety Co. v. Wemple, 58 Hun, 248, 12 N. Y. Supp. 271, Affirmed in 128 N. Y. 623, 27 N. E. 410.

Such a corporation is not exempted from such tax by a clause in a statute taxing only fire and marine insurance companies declaring that the personal property, franchise, and business of all insurance companies, foreign and domestic, shall thereafter be exempted from all 57 L. R. A.

assessment and taxation except as therein provided, because this broad language is necessarily qualified by the remainder of the law in which it occurs, and so is confined to fire and marine insurance companies alone. Ibid.

Receipts of a life insurance company not spent in operation nor added to the legal reserve, but put into a surplus fund, are taxable within a statute taxing corporations upon their net earnings, even where the company is conducted upon a purely mutual plan so that theoretically it has no net income. Com. v. Penn. Mut. L. Ins. Co. 1 Dauph. Co. Rep. 233.

And an exemption in the tax act of corporations liable to a tax on capital stock or gross receipts includes those liable to taxation upon gross premiums. Ibid.

When an insurance company is dissolved during the half year for which it is taxed in Pennsylvania upon gross premiums, it is liable only for the proportion of the tax accruing prior to dissolution. Com. v. American L. Ins. Co. 14 Pa. Co. Ct. 216.

2. Domestic companies.

A statute providing in substance that a state tax, as a franchise tax, of 2 per cent is to be levied annually upon the gross receipts or earnings of sundry corporations of designated characters incorporated under general or special laws of the state and doing business therein, and that all the provisions and requirements thereof shall be in force and apply to all foreign corporations of a like kind doing business in the state, imposes such tax only upon such receipts or earnings of domestic corporations within the statute as they derive from business done within the state and not upon their gross income gained everywhere. Since the legislature plainly could reach only such receipts of foreign corporations as were gained within the state, it is not supposable that it intended to tax home companies higher than foreign ones, and as the practice of the state officers in administering the law has uniformly been not to discriminate, the courts should so construe the act. State v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co. 93 Md. 314, 48 Atl. 918.

A domestic insurance company chartered originally as a purely mutual one, but since authorized by law, at discretion, to insure for cash premiums, which neither entitled the assured to membership nor subjected him to assessment, and accepting and acting under the new powers, makes itself liable to a tax upon gross premiums upon all domestic insurance companies from which those doing business upon a purely mutual plan without any capi-have a cash valuation, and be equalized and uniform throughout the state. The indebtedness presumably affects the value of the stock as directly as do the assets of the corporation. The former depreciates, while the latter appreciates, its value. The practical effect of this provision is to allow a double deduction of the amount of the corporate indebtedness. It would necessarily result in inequality of taxation, not only as between the associations themselves falling within the provisions of § 1530 (owing to differences in their financial condition), but also as between all such associations and persons or associations taxed under the general provisions of the tax law, who are not permitted to deduct their indebtedness from the value of franchises owned by them. See Henderson Bridge Co. v. Com. 99 Ky. 623; 29 L. R. A. 73, 31 S. W. 486.

tal stock or accumulated reserve are exempt. Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Com. 10 W. N. C. 228.

3. Foreign companies.

A state may lawfully impose taxes upon foreign insurance companies doing business within it of a percentage of the premium receipts. Ducat v. Chicago, 10 Wall. 410, 19 L. ed. 972; Oliver v. Liverpool & L. Life & F. Ins. Co. 100 Mass. 531, on Error, 10 Wall. 566, 19 L. ed. 1029.

A municipal ordinance imposing an annual license tax of 2 per cent on the premiums paid or promised to foreign insurance companies for business transacted in the city, such city being empowered by its charter and an amendatory act to license, regulate, and tax insurance brokers and agents, and to regulate agencies of all insurance companies within its jurisdiction, and being possessed of an organized fire department, is, and the penalties ordained for its infraction are enforceable, notwithstanding a general statute providing for an annual report of premium receipts and payment of a property tax thereon at the same rate as other taxes in lieu of all town and municipal licenses, when the general law contains a saving proviso leaving such cities free to levy license taxes to such a percentage for the support of their fire departments. Walker v. Springfield, 94 Ill. 364.

Unearned premiums returned to policy holders are not to be counted in computing the state percentage tax on gross premiums received by a foreign insurance company for business done in the taxing state. German Alliance Ins. Co. v. VanCleave, 191 Ill. 410, 61 N. E. 94.

A statute relating to foreign insurance companies, providing that the capital shall be deemed the aggregate value of the deposits made in the several states to secure policy holders together with bonds and mortgages on real estate in the United States, and that when said capital has not been taxed, and the taxes thereon paid by the main agency or the company in another state, then the taxation shall be upon the gross receipts less deductions governing domestic companies; but which neither provides nor indicates any method of ascertaining such gross receipts, and neither fixes nor authorizes the fixing of any rate of taxation; and when the general state revenue act, while comprehensively enumerating subjects of taxation, is wholly silent as to gross receipts,—is too indefinite to warrant the imposition of any tax upon foreign insurance companies

This presents the important question whether the invalidity of this provision renders the whole of § 1530 invalid, or whether its remaining provisions are valid notwithstanding the invalidity of this one provision. Without entering into any extended discussion of the rules governing the question when a statute may be held void in part and valid in part, we may refer to a few facts and practical considerations peculiarly applicable to the present case. In the first place, if the whole of § 1530 is held invalid, the only method by which any part of the intangible property of these corporations or associations could be reached for taxation would be under the provisions of the 14th subdivision of § 1524,—a system much less complete and equitable than that provided by § 1530, with the invalid provision omitted, and one which it is evident the legislature never actually intended to on account of their gross receipts. British Foreign Marine Ins. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 42 Fed. 90.

When a statute taxing premiums collected within the state by a foreign insurance company exempts therefrom, and from retaliatory clauses as well, all premiums loaned within the state for two years or more, investments thereof in municipal water bonds for that length of time are not taxable; these are true loans, not purchases. State v. North America Ins. Co. 55 Md. 492.

Assessments collected from its members by a foreign insurance company doing business on that plan are not premiums within a taxing statute, and a licensee cannot be refused a foreign organization of that character until it pays a percentage tax thereon. Northwestern Masonic Aid Assn. v. Waddill, 138 Mo. 628, 40 S. W. 648.

A statute granting power to a municipality to levy taxes for general purposes on all real and personal property within its limits taxable by the laws of the state, the valuation to be taken from the county assessment roll, is sufficient authority for a city tax upon the gross premiums collected in the city for a foreign insurance company when these are by a state law taxable in the hands of the resident agent. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Omaha, 23 Neb. 312, 36 N. W. 522.

The payment of a tax by an insurance company in accordance with the provisions of a new system of corporate taxation upon franchises and business for state purposes, set forth in a statute which provides that upon such payment the taxpaying corporation shall be exempt from assessment or taxation except as therein prescribed, does not relieve its resident agent from the payment of a specified percentage of its gross premiums from risks taken within a certain city exacted annually for a local incorporated firemen's association, since, although the exaction is in the nature of a license fee for state purposes, it is nevertheless local, and, while within the language of the exemption, is not within its meaning. Exempt Firemen's Benev. Fund v. Boome, 93 N. Y. 313, 45 Am. Rep. 217.

A foreign insurance company having an agency and being in receipt of premiums and licensed to do business in the state is liable to a state percentage tax upon such receipts under the licensing statute imposing them, in despite of a later statute for taxing such corporations which does not repeal the former one but does impose a tax upon all foreign and do-apply to the corporations and associations falling within the purview of § 1530. Again, while it cannot be denied that the legislature intended the provision for deducting the indebtedness from the value of the capital stock to be a part of the system of listing and assessing the property of these corporations and associations, yet this provision is easily separable from the other provisions of the section. What would remain would constitute a complete system of taxation, fully capable of being executed in accordance with what we think was the apparent legislative intent. The fact that this void provision is in the same section with other provisions is not important, for the distribution into sections is purely arbitrary. The test is, rather, whether the provisions are so essentially and inseparably connected and interdependent that the one may not operate without the other, or that it is impossible to suppose that the legislature would have passed the one without the other. There is no such essential and inseparable connection or interdependency in this case. The other provisions will operate, and can be executed, with this invalid provision stricken out. Neither is there anything to justify a court in holding that the legislature would not have enacted the statute with this obnoxious provision omitted. The evident intention was to reach for taxation the franchises and other intangible property of these corporations and associations as effectually and completely as possible. This the legislature thought could be best accomplished by listing and assessing the value of the stock, which, as already suggested, represents every element of property value, tangible and intangible, mestic corporations upon their capital stock, and expressly exempts therefrom foreign insurance companies licensed pursuant to general acts in relation thereto. Com. v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 11 Phila. 553.

Under legislation requiring foreign fire and inland navigation insurance companies to pay 2 per cent of the gross income of the preceding year on business done in the state; and all foreign life or accident companies to pay $300 annually for transacting "such" business; and all domestic life or accident companies to pay, in addition to such $300, 2 per cent upon their cash receipts for premiums on home state business done during the preceding year, as afterwards amended so as to make foreign accident insurance companies subject to the same fees and taxes paid by fire insurance companies doing business in the state,—there is added to the $300 license fee required of a foreign company doing an accident business in the state the additional requirement of 2 per cent of its gross income during the preceding year from state business; and therefore a combined life and accident foreign insurance company which has done business in the state for several years under a life insurance license, and only paid the $300 annual fee, is liable for the 2 per cent on gross income from state accident business, and may be deprived of its license if it does not pay such percentage for the past years. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Fricke, 94 Wis. 258, 68 N. W. 958, 99 Wis. 367, 41 L. R. A. 557, 74 N. W. 372.

Under the Ohio statute (Rev. Stat. § 2745) providing, inter alia, that certain dividends, cancellations, values, and commissions shall be deducted from the gross receipts, and the net balance shall be the basis of taxation for foreign insurance companies doing business in the state at the rate of 2½ per cent; but also providing that it shall be the insurance superintendent's duty to charge and collect from such companies such a sum as, added to the amount paid to the county treasurers, will produce the equal of 2½ per cent on such receipts of such companies as shown by their annual statements to the insurance department (which statements are required to show the gross receipts),—the basis of computation is the gross, and not the net, receipts. State ex rel. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Hahn, 50 Ohio St. 714, 35 N. E. 1052.

b. Taxes on bank deposits.

As before mentioned with respect of other franchise taxes, cases involving taxes on bank deposits in which was raised the question of the validity of the imposition because of contract relations, real or supposed, have been reserved for separate treatment; while cases wherein it appeared that the deposits subjected to taxation stood invested in United States bonds are referred to elsewhere herein.

When the United States revenue act of June 30, 1864, was amended (March 3, 1865) by omitting from § 110, reading: "There shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of 1-24 of 1 per cent each month upon the average amount of deposits of money subject to payment by check or draft, or represented by certificates of deposit or otherwise, whether payable on demand or at some future day with any person, bank, association, company, or corporation engaged in the business of banking, . . . provided, that this section shall not apply to . . . [any savings bank having no capital stock and whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning the same on interest for the benefit of the depositors only, and which do no other business of banking],"—the proviso brought such savings banks within the substantive provisions of the act. Bank for Savings v. The Collector, 3 Wall. 495, sub nom. Bank for Savings v. Field, 18 L. ed. 207.

Under the California system for taxation of bank deposits, not only are ordinary deposits subject to the tax, but also interest drawing debts of the bank for borrowed money. Security Sav. Bank & T. Co. v. Hinton, 97 Cal. 214, 32 Pac. 3; Main Street Sav. Bank & T. Co. v. Hinton (Cal.) 32 Pac. 6.

In Kentucky the banks are not required to pay tax on the money deposited with them by their customers, or on amounts which represent it. Deposit Bank v. Davless County, 102 Ky. 174, 44 L. R. A. 825, 39 S. W. 1030, 44 S. W. 1131, Affirmed in 178 U. S. 636, 663, 43 L. ed. 840, 850, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 530, 875.

Under an act (Md. Laws 1874, chap. 483, § 85), requiring savings banks that receive deposits and allow interest thereon to furnish the comptroller yearly the aggregate amounts of deposits in them and pay a state tax out of the interest due the depositors, such deposits as are invested in ground rents under ninety-nine year leases perpetually renewable on land which is assessed to the leasehold owner and taxed, are not within the scope of the act, since the tax thereby imposed is a property tax, and to construe the statute otherwise would result in a double taxation. State v. Central Sav. Bank, 67 Md. 290, 10 Atl. 290, 11 Atl. 357, Following State v. Sterling, 20 Md. 502, upon the ground of stare decisis.

And for the same reason upon the amendment of the statute (Code, § 86 of art. 81), re-owned by corporations or associations; but, in enumerating the deductions to be made, they erroneously included their indebtedness, presumably because they failed to perceive that this had already entered into, and gone to fix, the value of the stock, or that such a deduction would necessarily result in inequality of taxation. But, with this deduction omitted, what remains will effect the full and fair taxation of all the intangible property of these corporations and associations;—the very purpose which the legislature apparently had in mind. For these reasons our conclusion is that the remainder of the section should be held valid, notwithstanding the invalidity of the objectionable provision. The result is that the franchisees of the defendants could be taxed only through the taxation of their stock in the manner provided in § 1530.

quiring every savings bank to pay annually what is there designated as a franchisee tax to the amount of $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent on the total amount of deposits held by such savings bank, but declaring unequivocally that no other tax shall be laid on such bank in respect of such deposits, the securities in which such a bank has invested a part of the deposits are not taxable. Westminster v. Westminster Sav. Bank, 92 Md. 62, 48 Atl. 34.

The Massachusetts statute taxing certain insurance companies and depositors in savings banks was construed as providing that every domestic savings corporation should pay a state tax on account of its depositors of a fraction of 1 per cent on the amount of its deposits, to be assessed, one half on the average amount of deposits in the preceding half year, in May and November, and as exempting all property taxed as above for the current year in which such tax was paid. Provident Inst. for Savings v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 611, 18 L. ed. 907.

The basis of computing such tax was held to be the amount deposited, together with interest and dividends accruing and payable to depositors, but not to include undivided profits or a guaranty fund. Re Suffolk Sav. Bank, 151 Mass. 103, 23 N. E. 728.

And when a statute taxes all personal estate in or out of the state to be assessed to the owner at the place he inhabits deposits by a foreign corporation in a Massachusetts bank are not taxable, because such a depositor, being domiciled in its home state, does not become an inhabitant of Massachusetts by merely doing business therein. Boston Invest. Co. v. Boston, 158 Mass. 461, 33 N. E. 580.

It affords no claim to a reduction of a tax upon savings bank deposits and accumulations or dividends due depositors in New Hampshire that part of its assets earned no income during the tax year, and will be equally unprofitable during the next; nor that its surplus is relatively less than that of other savings banks, and consequently its exemptions not so large. Union Five Cents Sav. Bank's Petition, 68 N. H. 384, 36 Atl. 17.

When savings bank depositors are taxable at their respective places of residence upon their deposits the bank is not taxable upon corporate stocks in which it has invested such deposits for income. Provident Inst. for Sav. v. Gardiner, 4 R. I. 484, Following American Bank v. Mumford, 4 R. I. 478.

Under a statute providing that every bank and trust company shall pay a state tax of a fraction of 1 per cent upon the average amount of its deposits, including money or securities

2. The method adopted by the county board of equalization in increasing the valuation of items 18 and 27, and by the county auditor in apportioning the increase between the two items, may have been irregular; but the defendants are not in position to successfully object, for the reason that it is neither alleged nor shown that they are at all prejudiced thereby. There is no claim that there has been an overvaluation of either item.

3. The case of the Duluth Street-Railway Company presents a question not involved in the other cases, viz., Is it taxable as a railroad company, under Gen. Laws 1887, chap. 11, § 1 (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 1669); that is, by taxing it a percentage on its gross earnings? Assuming, without deciding, the validity of this act, it applies only to what are usually known as ordinary com-received as trustee under an order of court or otherwise, deducting therefrom, inter alia, the amount of individual deposits in excess of $1,500 each, and that no other tax shall be assessed upon such deposits except on individual deposits exceeding $1,500, a trust fund of $23,000, created by will for the benefit of a minor under guardianship, and deposited by an order of the probate court with a trust company, which keeps it in a separate fund and accounts for its actual earnings, is not exempt, but is within the general laws relating to taxation and subject to a city assessment under chartered power to tax. Montpellier Sav. Bank & T. Co. v. Montpellier, 73 Vt. 364, 50 Atl. 1117.

VII. Organizations subject to franchise taxes.

a. Generally.

Taxation is the rule, exemption the exception; therefore, all sorts and conditions of organizations that can be made to bear franchise taxes are subjected thereto.

A water company vested with the right of corporate existence and powers common to all corporations of succession, seal, suing and defending, buying and selling, and of doing business in a corporate capacity; having a right to condemn and take needed lands and waters, and to occupy with its mains the public streets, and distribute and sell water at rates fixed by a prescribed legal method, is possessed of franchises capable of private ownership, and hence taxable under a constitution requiring all property not exempt by Federal laws to be taxed ad valorem, and defining property as inclusive of franchises capable of private ownership. Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69.

A statute taxing all packing houses doing a cold-storage business in the state, whether by the principal or an agent, is not inclusive of a concern maintaining a refrigerator plant to preserve its own commodities pending sale, and which does not receive or store for any others whomsoever. Stewart v. Atlanta Beef Co. 93 Ga. 12, 18 S. E. 981.

Under a state constitution providing that naught contained in it shall be construed to prevent the legislature from providing for taxation based on income, licenses, or franchises, that body is not restricted to taxing only such privileges as fall within the well-defined legal meaning of the term "franchises," but it may, in a statute taxing banking franchisees, provide for taxing, not only corporations exercising them, but private individuals as well when they carry on the banking business. Providence mercial railways, and not to street railways. This is the practical construction which has always been placed on this statute by both the state and the street-railway companies. The correctness of this construction was assumed without question by this court in State v. Eleventh Judicial Dist. Ct. 54 Minn. 34, 55 N. W. 816. All through our statutes the legislature has uniformly, so far as we have discovered, used the word "railroad" or "railway," when unqualified, as referring exclusively to ordinary commercial railroads, while, on the other hand, when they have intended to refer to street railroads they have qualified the word "railroad" by the prefix "street." See Funk v. St. Paul City R. Co. 61 Minn. 435, 29 L. R. A. 208, 63 N. W. 1099. Of late, street-railway companies have been gradually extending somewhat the sphere and character of their operations. This fact may render it rather difficult in some few cases to determine to which class a particular road belongs, but it does not obliterate the inherent difference between the main purposes and functions of the two classes. Speaking generally, a street railway is local, derives its business from the streets along which it is operated, and is in aid of the local travel upon those streets, while a commercial railway usually derives its business, either directly, or indirectly through connecting roads, from a large area of territory, and not from the travel on the streets of those cities, either terminal or way stations, along which they happen to be constructed and operated. In fact, so far from being an aid or advantage, they are a positive impediment, to the travel on such streets. Hence it is held that the one

When a statute of that character requires specified corporations, and "also every other corporation, company, or association having . . . any special or exclusive privilege or franchise, . . . or performing any public service" to pay a tax upon its franchise, it includes all corporations, not merely those like the ones named. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Norman, 77 Fed. 13.

It includes an association authorized to lay out a race course and sell pools on the races run thereon. Latonia Agricultural & S. Asso. v. Donnelly, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1891, 50 S. W. 251.

Even a municipality with a franchise to operate water works. Newport v. Com. 21 Ky. L. Rep. 42, 45 L. R. A. 518, 50 S. W. 845, 51 S. W. 483.

When the Constitution commits to the legislature discretionary power, but does not command it to levy a tax upon those who pursue any trade, calling, or business, and the legislature accordingly enacts a license tax law applying but to banks having a stated capital and upwards, a bank with less capital is not within the statute, hence not liable to the license tax. State ex rel. Huson v. Bank of Mansfield, 48 La. Ann. 1029, 20 So. 201.

To warrant the exaction of such a tax there must be some express provision of law. Ibid.

A statute imposing a specific tax upon all fire insurance companies under a penalty of double the amount for carrying on business without prepaying it applies to a corporation organized upon the mutual co-operative plan of insuring its members and which has no capital nor reserve, and is not intended for profit, but which meets every loss by a special assessment on its members, and pays only what such assessment may yield. Lee Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. State, 60 Miss. 395.

A railroad which runs over its own line a car stocked with goods that it furnishes to its own employees only in lieu of wages in cash, and does not sell at all to others, is not within a statute taxing the privilege of running a trading car. Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. State, 62 Miss. 105.

And a railroad operating a telegraph line, not for profit, but solely as a needful adjunct to the safe and expeditious movement of its trains, and which exercises no telegraph franchise, is not a telegraph company operating miles of wire within a statute taxing such companies upon their privileges. Adams v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. (Miss.) 13 So. 932.

A statute concerning money brokers and exchange dealers and the licensing thereof, forbidding any person, association, or company of persons to carry on the business of dealing in, buying, selling, or shaving any kind of bills of exchange, checks, drafts, etc., without a license, does not apply to savings banks authorized by their charters to engage in such transactions. State v. Field, 49 Mo. 270.

The same is true of savings banks in Tennessee. State v. Nashville Sav. Bank, 16 Lea, 111.

The Massachusetts statute laying a state tax upon fire or marine, or both, insurance companies incorporated or associated under the laws of any government or state other than one of the United States, of a percentage upon all premiums charged or received on contracts for the insurance of property made within the commonwealth, applies to a partnership of individuals, citizens of New York and British subjects associated under the laws of Great Britain. Oliver v. Liverpool & L. Life & F. Ins. Co. 100 Mass. 531, Affirmed on Error in 10 Wall. 566, 19 L. ed. 1029.

A statute taxing for state purposes every corporation, joint-stock company, and association whatsoever incorporated or organized under any law of the state or by or under the laws of any other state or country and doing business in the state (with certain exceptions), upon its corporate franchise or business, to be computed annually, according to circumstances, upon its capital or a valuation thereof, embraces an association of individuals formed by articles of agreement to carry on a forwarding agency, banking, exchange, and insurance business between divers selected cities and towns of the United States and foreign countries to continue in force for the term of ten years, and afterwards from time to time extended according to adopted by-laws; described in such articles as a joint-stock company, and having a capital divided into shares transferable by the holder to whomsoever he chooses, represented by certificates, managed by a board of directors, and, in the name of its president, litigating, taking, holding, and conveying real estate, and which is not dissolved by the death of any member or number of members less than a majority; and which organization is within the permissive terms of sundry statutes respecting its kind, although the associating articles do not refer to them. People ex rel. Platt v. Wemple, 117 N. Y. 136, 6 L. R. A. 303, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 735, 22 N. E. 1046, Affirming 52 Hun, 434, 5 N. Y. Supp. 581.

But while this is so, the distinction between this kind of an organization and corporations is still preserved in the state of New York, and a joint-stock company, despite of successive leg-constitutes an additional servitude on the street, while the other does not. Carli v. Stillwater Street R. & Transfer Co. 28 Minn. 373, 41 Am. Rep. 290, 10 N. W. 205. The Duluth Street-Railway Company was organized under Gen. Stat. 1894, chap. 34, title 1, and the acts amendatory thereof. The general nature of its business, as stated in its articles of association, is to construct, maintain, and operate railways in the streets and highways of the city of Duluth and its suburbs, including Lakeside, Lester Park, West Duluth (all or most of which are now parts of the city of Duluth), and in the roads connecting the same in St. Louis county, and over any other lands in St. Louis county upon which the right to do so may be acquired by it by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise. Certain additional powers were granted to it by Sp.

lative enactments clothing such concerns with various corporate attributes, is not taxable under a statutory provision for taxing the capital of all monied or stock corporations deriving an income or profit from their capital or otherwise. People ex rel. Winchester v. Coleman, 138 N. Y. 279, 16 L. R. A. 183, 31 N. E. 96.

The latter case was followed in respect of an attempt to tax the Adams Express Company, a similar organization in Pennsylvania, under a statute of that state imposing an annual tax upon the capital stock of all companies incorporated by or under the laws of that state, and upon that of every company doing business therein incorporated by any other state. Gregg v. Sanford, 12 C. C. A. 525, 28 U. S. App. 813, 65 Fed. 151.

But limited partnerships formed under the laws of Pennsylvania, having privileges essentially the same as corporate franchises, are taxable thereon the same as like corporations. Com. v. Sandyllick Gas Coal & C. Co. 1 Dauph. Co. Rep. 814.

A street railway company operating the plants of electric light companies and supplying light therewith is not subject to taxation upon the franchises of such companies, because these belong in law to them, and not to the railway corporation, and are assessable against the owners only. The electric light companies are incompetent to alienate to the railway corporation their franchises and property necessary to the exercise thereof, so as to disable them from discharging the public duties that are the consideration of the grant of franchises to them. State ex rel. Milwaukee Street R. Co. v. Anderson, 90 Wis. 550, 63 N. W. 746.

In assessing a franchise tax measured by dividends made or declared during the year the comptroller is not justified in treating as a dividend the excess above par value of the capital stock distributed to stockholders from the proceeds of all its lands condemned and taken for public purposes by right of eminent domain, when, during the year, such corporation has done no business, and simply kept up its corporate organization in order to receive and distribute the award. People ex rel. Jerome Park Villa Site & Improv. Co. v. Roberts, 41 App. Div. 21, 58 N. Y. Supp. 254.

When a statute imposes a franchise tax upon every trust company or savings bank and trust company incorporated by and doing business in the taxing state on the average amount of its deposits, assessable semi-annually, the right to lay it is measured by the exercise of the franchises; and a corporation otherwise subject thereto, which has been enjoined from trans-

Laws 1881 (Ex. Sess.) chap. 200, entitled "An Act Confirming [Conferring?] Certain Rights upon the Duluth Street Railway Company." By an ordinance of the city of Duluth, it was granted the right to construct and operate an inclined street railway in the city, and by another ordinance of the city it was granted the right to construct and operate street railways in the village of West Duluth, which had become a part of the city of Duluth. While the defendant still owns all the franchises thus granted, the entire extent to which it has exercised them is, as found by the court, to "own and operate a passenger railway line in the streets of the city of Duluth 16 miles in length." This we construe as meaning the aggregate length of all its lines in the streets of the city. So far as it appears, it has constructed and is operating its road acting business and put in the hands of a receiver, is not liable for the tax while its business is suspended. State v. Bradford Sav. Bank & T. Co. 71 Vt. 234, 44 Atl. 349.

b. Domestic corporations.

1. In general.

The power of a state to impose franchise taxes upon its own corporations is practically without limit.

Sald, Strong, J., in the State Freight Tax Case, 15 Wall. 232, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 146, we concede the right and power of the state to tax the franchises of its corporations.

A state, in granting a franchise to a corporation, may limit the powers to be exercised under it, and annex conditions to its enjoyment, and make it contribute to the revenue. If the grantee accepts the boon it must bear the burden. Monroe County Sav. Bank v. Rochester, 37 N. Y. 367.

In the case of People v. Home Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 328, 338, it was undisputed that a state, in the exercise of its legislative power, has the right to impose taxes upon the business, privileges, and franchises of a domestic corporation; and when that case reached the United States Supreme Court, where the decision was affirmed, it was emphatically declared that no constitutional objection prevents the legislature of a state from prescribing any mode of measurement it may choose to determine how much it will charge for the privilege it bestows; and that the validity of a tax can be in no wise dependent on the manner adopted by the state in fixing the amount it exacts for the franchise. Home Ins. Co. v. New York, 134 U. S. 594, 33 L. ed. 1025, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 593.

So that, unless a franchise tax upon a domestic corporation plainly conflicts with some constitutional limitation on the legislative power, its validity is assumed. There are not wanting cases in which such taxes have been challenged upon the ground that the imposition thereof constitutes a denial of the equal protection of the laws or of due process of law required by the Federal Constitution, or infringes against the clauses common in state constitutions requiring uniformity and equality of taxation, but these must be left for discussion in another place.

The laws of Illinois for the assessment and taxation of domestic railroads classify the subjects of the tax as: (1) Capital stock, meaning thereby all the property and rights of the corporation of every kind and nature wherever loin the same manner as street railroads are usually constructed and operated,—in aid of, and deriving its business from, the local travel on the streets of the city. While the defendant may possess some unexercised powers not ordinarily conferred upon street-railway companies, yet it is perfectly apparent that it is in all essential respects a "street," and not a "commercial" railroad. Therefore the "gross earnings" tax law of 1887 does not apply.

These proceedings are each and all remanded, with directions to the court below to disallow in each case that part of the tax assessed upon "item 14" entitled "Franchises, annuities, royalties, and patent rights," and to render judgment in favor of the state for the remainder of the taxes as assessed.

Canty, J., concurring:

I concur. After striking out subdivision 5 of § 1530 as unconstitutional, the rest of the section may, in my opinion, be allowed to stand. In my opinion, the legislature may provide for deducting the corporate indebtedness from the value of such intangible property as franchises and good will, when listing such intangible property for taxation. That will be the result of rejecting said 5th subdivision as unconstitutional, and permitting the rest of the section to stand, because, in giving a market value to the stock (see 4th subdivision), the public ated; (2) railroad track, embracing the right of way and the superstructures thereon and declared to be real estate for the purposes of taxation; (3) rolling stock, declared to be personal property and embracing the movable chattels such as cars, locomotives, and their accompaniments, usually in ordinary use moved to and fro along the line; and (4) personal property other than rolling stock, embracing tools, materials for repairs, machinery, and other chattels not ordinarily moved up and down the road. Property of the fourth class with lands not part of the second constitute the local and tangible property of the corporation; while all its other possessions, including the franchise and other things of value inaccessible for local assessment, make up the intangible property, which, combined, is capital stock assessable by the state board. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Weber, 96 Ill. 443.

This system, whereby the state board values the tracks, right of way, improvements thereon, rolling stock, and the capital stock, including the franchise and all invisible, immaterial, and intangible property; and the local assessors in counties, cities, and towns into or through which the roads run value the tangible property in proportion that the mileage in each taxing district bears to the total length of the road,—is just and equitable, and within the constitutional powers of the state. State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, sub nom. Taylor v. Secor, 23 L. ed. 668.

It is not a valid objection to this system that rolling stock, capital stock, and franchise of a domestic railroad are personal property having a situs for taxation only at the principal office of the company and taxable nowhere else, for the state has the power and right to fix the situs of personal property within its jurisdiction at any place where any part of it may be situated. Ibid.

This case was followed and approved in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Siders, 88 Ill. 322.

The state of New York over two decades ago enacted a statute (chap. 542, Laws 1880) taxing domestic corporations and foreign ones doing business within its limits upon their corporate franchises or business for state purposes. This statute "inaugurated a new system of taxation" in that state of certain classes of corporations. People v. Spring Valley Hydraulic Gold Co. 92 N. Y. 383, 386, Andrews, J.

So far, said Earl, J., as it imposes a tax upon corporate franchises its operation must be confined to corporations created under New York laws, and as to foreign corporations the tax is imposed solely upon business. People v. Equitable Trust Co. 96 N. Y. 387, 393.

And Burtlett, J., declared that this corporation tax is not imposed on property, but in the case of a domestic corporation on its franchises, and of a foreign corporation on its business. People ex rel. United Verde Copper Co. v. Roberts, 156 N. Y. 585, 591, 51 N. E. 293, Reversing 25 App. Div. 89, 48 N. Y. Supp. 881.

Ever since the enactment of that statute the courts of that state have been kept busy construing and interpreting it and the amendatory laws designed to remedy its defects.

In Nassau Gaslight Co. v. Brooklyn, 89 N. Y. 409, the question was whether a city gas company was within the statute or the exceptions it contained.

In People ex rel. Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. Davenport, 91 N. Y. 574, it was decided that, in spite of language to the contrary, the act did not relieve corporations taxable under it from local taxation. "The act," said Ruger, Ch. J. (p. 590), "is too loosely and inconsistently expressed to induce us to give it the sweeping effect which is claimed for it." He had previously declared (p. 584): "It cannot be disputed but that the language employed in the exemption clause of this section, if considered literally, is broad enough to sustain the claim." The conclusion that the statute did not mean what it said seems to have been reached "by main strength." The legislature promptly amended the act to cover this point the next session (Laws 1881, chap. 361, § 8), and passed a separate act to validate the tax (Laws 1881, chap. 332).

The same court found no difficulty in holding the statute meant what it said when it purported to impose a tax upon the corporate franchise or business, because to hold otherwise the tax would have rested upon nontaxable government bonds. People v. Home Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 328, Affirmed in 134 U. S. 594, 33 L. ed. 1025, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 593; in affirming which decision the United States Supreme Court further declared that a state may lawfully require as a condition of the grant of a franchise to be a corporation or to do business as such, and also for the continued exercise of such right or privilege, payment of a specific sum to the state each year or month, or a specific portion of the gross receipts or of the profits of the corporation, or of a sum to be ascertained in any convenient mode which the state prescribes.

And as late as 1901 a part of § 182 of the New York tax law (chap. 908, Laws 1896), which in substance was the same as § 3, chap. 342, Laws 1880, had to be discarded, the only question between counsel being what part must go. Cullen, J., in the opinion of the court, after construing the section one way because a contrary interpretation would effect unreasonable results, added: We are quite aware that, despite our construction of the statute, there will still remain in it some inconsistencies and apparent unfairness in particular cases.

deducts the corporate indebtedness. In my opinion, the legislature has, under the Constitution, more latitude in providing for the assessment of such intangible property than it has in providing for the assessment of tangible real and personal property, and, as before stated, may provide for assessing only the balance of such intangible property after deducting the corporate indebtedness. But by the scheme proposed by § 1530 the corporate indebtedness is deducted twice,—once by the public, in giving a market value to the stock, and once more by virtue of the 5th subdivision. Therefore the scheme is unconstitutional, because, where there is no corporate indebtedness, it taxes the franchises and good will to their full value, but where there is corporate indebtedness it deducts double the amount of such indebtedness from the value of such intangible property. If the legislature will tax such intangible property at all, it must, as far as it is reasonably practicable to do so, tax it uniformly. It is this double deduction of the corporate indebtedness, as distinguished from single deduction, which is unconstitutional; and, while I have had some doubt about it, I am of the opinion that the provision for such double deduction may be rejected as unconstitutional, and the rest of the section allowed to stand.

The remedy must be an appeal to the legislature for modification of the law. People ex rel. New York & E. River Ferry Co. v. Roberts, 168 N. Y. 14, 18, 60 N. E. 1043, Reversing 85 App. Div. 625, 55 N. Y. Supp. 1146.

A statute requiring every corporation incorporated under any general or special state law, and having capital stock divided into shares, to pay the state treasurer a state tax of a specified fraction of 1 per cent upon its authorized capital at the time of its incorporation, and forbidding every public officer to file its organization certificate and itself to exercise any corporate powers until such payment is made, does not provide for a price to be paid for the franchise the corporation is to exercise after it is formed, but merely the price of the right to be a corporation at all; therefore a body that has lawfully acquired upon foreclosure the franchises of a railroad company, and is organized to operate it by permission of other laws, is bound to pay the organization tax in order to be invested with corporate powers. People ex rel. Schurz v. Cook, 47 Hun, 467, Affirmed in 110 N. Y. 443, 18 N. E. 113.

To the like effect is Ashley v. Ryan, 153 U. S. 436, 38 L. ed. 773, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 664, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865.

A domestic corporation having paid its organization tax and a further tax upon increasing its capital is none the less upon reincorporating under another and later statute for the same purposes bound to pay a new organization tax. Re New York & S. Invest. Co. 40 N. Y. S. R. 139, 16 N. Y. Supp. 213.

A corporation formed while a statute requiring payment of a tax as a condition precedent to exercising any corporate powers is in force is without legal existence until it pays the tax, and therefore cannot recover upon its contracts. Maryland Tube & I. Works v. West End Improv. Co. 87 Md. 207, 39 L. R. A. 810, 39 Atl. 620.

Under a statute taxing domestic corporations upon their franchises according to the capital employed within the state, a corporation whose capital is invested in patent rights which it parceled out to divers subordinate corporations both foreign and domestic, taking stocks and bonds in exchange, is not to be regarded as employing the whole of its capital in the home state, but only such part of it as is represented by the stocks of domestic companies, the rights not yet conveyed and the bonds of foreign corporations or other choses in action which have been drawn to and have their situs at the domicile. The capital invested in the stocks of foreign corporations is employed without the state. People ex rel. Edison Electric Light Co. v. Campbell, 188 N. Y. 543, 20 L. R. A. 453, 34 N. E. 370.

Under such a statute, surplus and what it is invested in are no part of the capital stock, 57 L. R. A.

and therefore a domestic corporation organized to carry on some of its business in the state of its origin, but mining, milling, and other operations in a distant territory, which merely maintains a home office where it keeps certain accounts and occasionally makes contracts to be performed in other states, and where some of its officers, executive and fiscal, attend, and which there holds a large block of stock and bonds got by passing dividends and using the accumulated profits to construct for a foreign corporation 25 miles of railroad in the territory where its mines were operated only to carry supplies to and ores away from its mines, is not taxable on such stocks and bonds as a part of its capital stock. These investments of surplus cannot be regarded as converted into capital stock employed at home for the purposes of such franchise tax on any theory that, the mines being a wasting property ever tending to exhaustion, the longer they are worked the more the capital stock invested in them must be deemed impaired so that there is no surplus. People ex rel. United Verde Copper Co. v. Roberts, 156 N. Y. 585, 51 N. E. 293, Reversing 25 App. Div. 89, 48 N. Y. Supp. 881.

Statutes taxing domestic corporations on their corporate franchises measured by the capital stock employed in the home state are not in conflict with any provision of the Federal Constitution, nor of the Constitution of the state of New York, even if in their practical operation they do in a given case result in unequal and double taxation. People ex rel. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Campbell, 70 Hun, 507, 24 N. Y. Supp. 208.

Capital of a domestic corporation invested in idle and unproductive land is not employed within the state so as to be the basis of such a franchise tax. People ex rel. Niagara River Hydraulic Co. v. Roberts, 30 App. Div. 180, 51 N. Y. Supp. 771, Affirmed on opinion below, 157 N. Y. 676, 51 N. E. 1093.

Under a statute taxing corporations, joint-stock companies, and associations organized by or under the laws of the enacting state, or organized or incorporated under those of any other state or country, and doing business within the taxing state upon their corporate franchises or business, domestic corporations are taxable irrespective of whether they employ any capital or not within the state and when carrying on their entire business outside of it. The qualifying words "doing business within the state," in such statute, relate to foreign corporations only. People ex rel. American Contracting & Dredging Co. v. Wemple, 129 N. Y. 558, 29 N. E. 812.

Premiums received by a fire insurance company for insuring property without the state regardless of where the policy is written or the money for it paid do not come under a tax

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

COMMERCIAL ELECTRIC LIGHT & POWER COMPANY

v.

(21 Wash. 49.)

1. A taxpayer who appears before a board of equalization and is heard upon the valuation of his property as fixed by the assessor without objecting to the manner in which the board is constituted cannot recover back the amount paid under the assessment as raised by the board, upon the ground that the board was illegally constituted.

2. The franchise of an electric light and power company which has a right law imposing a percentage tax upon premiums received by domestic insurance corporations upon business done within the state. People v. National F. Ins. Co. 61 How. Pr. 334.

This proposition was affirmed on appeal while the case was reversed on other grounds. 27 Hun, 188.

A corporation which is merely maintaining a perfunctory organization while waiting the payment of an award for its lands condemned for public use that it may go into liquidation is not subject to a franchise tax, since it is neither employing capital nor doing business within the state, when that is the basis thereof. People ex rel. Jerome Park, Villa Site & Improv. Co. v. Roberts, 41 App. Div. 21, 58 N. Y. Supp. 254.

The meaning of capital employed within the state, in a statute making that the basis of a franchise tax, is actively employed in the corporate business, when the rule for computing the tax is that laid down in People ex rel. New York & E. River Ferry Co. v. Roberts, 168 N. Y. 14, 60 N. E. 1043. Hence, a corporation taxed by such rule is entitled to the exclusion of a piece of real estate it does not use but rents out, and a block of municipal bonds it holds as an investment, from among the bases of the tax. People ex rel. Union Ferry Co. v. Roberts, 66 App. Div. 157, 72 N. Y. Supp. 950.

A bank under injunction and in the hands of a receiver is not doing business so as to be taxable under a statute taxing domestic savings banks and trust companies doing business within the state. State v. Bradford Sav. Bank & T. Co. 71 Vt. 234, 44 Atl. 349.

A state statute taxing savings banks by an assessment twice a year upon the average amount of their deposits for the preceding six months, imposing as it does a license or franchise tax, and not a property tax on the deposits, does not subject a bank in the hands of a receiver and perpetually enjoined from doing business when the assessment date comes around, to any liability, although it did carry on business and receive deposits for a part of the previous half year. Com. v. Lancaster Sav. Bank, 123 Mass. 493.

But a savings institution that has stopped collecting dues from all its members except those indebted on loans, and which makes no new loans, is still doing business within the meaning of a tax act applying to corporations. Com. v. Pottsville Union Sav. Fund Asso. 2 Dauph. Co. Rep. 19.

A law taxing corporate franchisees, that requires the charge under it to be based on the authorized capital stock represented by property owned and used in the enacting state, requires a domestic corporation whose entire property is in that state to pay a $5,000 fee on a $500,000 capitalization. Etna Standard Iron & S. Co. v. Taylor, 5 Ohio C. D. 242.

(April 6, 1899.)

CROSS-APPEALS from the Superior Court for Pierce County rendered in an action brought to recover back the amount of taxes alleged to have been unlawfully exacted; the plaintiff appealing from so much of the judgment as held any part of the tax valid, and defendants appealing from so much as authorized the recovery of a tax

erty owned and used in the enacting state, requires a domestic corporation whose entire property is in that state to pay a $5,000 fee on a $500,000 capitalization. Etna Standard Iron & S. Co. v. Taylor, 5 Ohio C. D. 242.

The repeal of a statute under which a franchise tax has accrued before it has been collected does not discharge a savings bank which was subject thereto from the payment of it. State v. Waterville Sav. Bank, 68 Me. 515.

When a state has charged and received a specific sum as the price for a franchise and as the consideration for the enjoyment thereof during the life of the corporate charter, it is precluded from further exactions by way of taxes on such franchise, since this in substance is adding to a price already paid in full. Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 3 How. 133, 145, 146, 150, 11 L. ed. 529, 535, 537. As Wayne, J., writing for the court, put it, the franchise is corporate property, which, like any other property, would be taxable if a price had not been paid for it which the legislature had accepted as the consideration for allowing the shareholders to use the franchise during the continuance of the charter. The learned justice reasoned: A round sum, or an annual charge with or without reference to capital stock, may be asked by the legislature for such a franchise. It may be more convenient to the banks to have such a consideration or bonus distributed through the years of their corporate existence than to pay its equivalent in advance. This option was given the old banks. Being so given, it is conclusive that the legislature intended the annual tax or charge upon the capital stocks of the banks to be the bonus or price that they were to pay for the prolongation of their franchise of banking. Such a contract is a limitation upon the taxing power of the legislature making it, and upon succeeding legislatures, to impose any further tax upon the franchise.

This case is considered by Messrs. Angell and Ames (Corporations, § 470) opposed to the doctrine of Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. 514, 7 L. ed. 939, and it is criticised by Dorsey, J., writing for the Maryland court of appeals, in Baltimore v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 6 Gill, 288, 48 Am. Dec. 531.

The reader will find these cases more fully referred to in another note respecting corporate taxation as affected by the contract clause in the United States Constitution.

A domestic corporation operating under telephone patents, and drawing its gross receipts from a business of furnishing instruments, apparatus, wires, and facilities for transmitting speech by electricity between peron plaintiff's franchise. Reversed on defendant's appeal.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mcass, Stiles & Nash, for plaintiff:

The whole of the tax assessed against appellant's property was absolutely void, because there was no lawful board of equalization in the county to which it could appeal for correction of its assessment.

The only resort for redress as to personal property is the board of equalization, except in case of fraud. Such a tribunal acts judicially.

It must be constituted as the law provides, and must sit at the time and place fixed for its sessions, or its acts are without jurisdiction, and the tax levied is void.

sons at a distance apart, incorporated under an act for the construction and maintenance of a telegraph line and a supplement providing for the incorporation and regulation of certain corporations relative to the powers of telegraph companies for use of individuals and others and for fire-alarm, police, and messenger business,—is within a statute imposing a state tax upon the gross receipts of every domestic telegraph company or foreign one doing business in the state. Com. v. Pennsylvania Teleph. Co. 2 Dauph. Co. Rep. 57.

A corporation chartered with all the rights, powers, and privileges of a designated railroad and transportation company, having built and for a time operated a short-line railroad which it sold to another domestic corporation of whose stock it owns nearly the half, and whose principal business is a steamship line across the Atlantic and to a port in another state, is not within the exception in a statute of its home state imposing a specified percentage bonus tax upon the authorized capital stock of domestic corporations, except railroad, canal, turnpike, bridge, cemetery, literary, charitable, and religious companies. International Nav. Co. v. Com. 104 Pa. 88.

A taxing statute requiring corporate officers to furnish the assessor a statement of the corporate real estate and the matters and value of its personal property to the end that the same be assessed for taxation as other real and personal property, coupled with provisions making resident stockholders exempt from taxation on their shares when the corporation is taxed, and liable only when it is not assessable, provides for the taxation of all the corporate property, tangible and intangible, including the franchise. Lewiston Water & P. Co. v. Asotin County, 24 Wash. 371, 64 Pac. 544.

2. Engaged in interstate commerce.

The general rule is that a state may tax its own corporations upon their franchises without regard to the nature of the business they carry on. This rule does not yield when that business is interstate or foreign commerce, even if the corporation subject to the tax is engaged in nothing else.

The exercise of the authority which every state possesses to tax its corporations and all their property, real and personal, and their franchisees, and to graduate the tax upon the corporations according to their business or income, or the value of their property, when this is not done by discriminating against rights held in other states, and the tax is not on im-

In the latter case, Garrison, J., writing for the court, divides into three groups the cases wherein the Supreme Court of the United States has adjudged state laws void for repugnancy to the commerce clause, viz.:

taining its value, which our statute does not do.

Mr. A. B. Titlow, for defendants:

A franchise is subject to taxation.

Wash. Const. art. 7, § 1; Revenue Laws 1897, p. 136; Ballinger's Code, § 5202.

Without any statute making a franchise personal property and subject to execution or foreclosure, and without any statute specially requiring a franchise to be listed as personal property for taxation, a franchise, under the Constitution and the revenue laws of this state would be subject to taxation in any event, as it has always been recognized as a thing of value.

3. Possessed of other franchises.

The mere fact that a domestic corporation holds, in addition to the franchise granted by its home state, other franchises from the United States, or from another state, does not prevent the state that gave it life from taxing it upon the franchise it conferred. In so doing it must, however, carefully avoid taxing any franchise that it did not confer. California v. Central P. R. Co. 127 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 150, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 153, 8 Sup. Ct. c. Foreign corporations.

1. In general.

No state has the power to tax franchises it has not conferred; hence, a state cannot tax the franchise of a foreign corporation to be or to do business as a corporation. The power of even the national government to tax a franchise granted by a state is not admitted, but is at best an open question.

In Vezale Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533, 19 L. ed. 482, the United States Supreme Court avoided deciding the question by holding the act of Congress taxing banks, state and national, 10 per cent on notes of individuals or state banks paid out for circulation, did not impose any tax upon a franchise granted by

R. Co. v. Morrow, 87 Tenn. 406, 2 L. R. A. 553, 11 S. W. 348.

Plaintiff would not be allowed to question the valuation of its personal property after its hearing which it had before the board of equalization.

Olympia Waterworks v. Gelbach, 16 Wash. 482, 43 Pac. 251.

The board had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and, by the appearance of the plaintiff in response to the notice sent it by the board to appear and show cause why its assessment should not be raised, acquired jurisdiction of the person of plaintiff; and, having acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person, without special appearance at the time it submitted itself to the board without protest, it cannot now be heard to complain that the board was illegally constituted.

the state, but laid one upon property created or contracts made and issued under the franchise or power to emit bank bills. Chase, Ch. J., writing for the court, did say that it cannot be admitted that franchises granted by a state are necessarily exempt from Federal taxation, for franchises are property,—often very valuable and productive property; and when not conferred for the purpose of giving effect to some reserved power of a state, seem to be as properly objects of taxation as any other property. And again, after emphasis upon the ruling that the tax sub judice is not one on the franchise, he proceeds: We do not say that there may not be such a tax. It may be admitted that the reserved rights of the states, such as the right to pass laws, to give effect to laws through executive action, to administer justice through the courts, and to employ all necessary agencies for legitimate purposes of state government, are not proper subjects of the taxing power of Congress.

However that may be, it is undisputed that one state cannot tax a corporate franchise granted by another. But practically the same result is accomplished when a state imposes a tax upon a foreign corporation for the privilege of exercising its corporate franchise within the limits of the taxing state. Judge Cooley calls attention to this by saying: The state which grants corporate powers, or consents to their being exercised within its limits when the corporate grant is by some other sovereign, may annex to the grant or consent such terms in respect to taxation as it deems expedient. Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 23. And, again: As no state is under obligation to permit a foreign corporation to carry on business or exercise franchises within its territory the permission to do so may be granted under such restrictions, or permitted on such conditions, regarding taxation as the state may think proper or prudent to impose. Id. chap. 3, p. 57.

In New York the courts have ever been at pains to discriminate between the two kinds of franchise taxes.

The court of appeals, in sustaining, as within the constitutional power of the legislature, a tax of this character upon a foreign corporation, which it none the less deemed specific, arbitrary, unequal, unjust, and worthy of condemnation of enlightened statesmanship, said, speaking through Earl, J.: The defendant, being a foreign corporation, could not be taxed in that state on account of its corporate franchise, as that was not given by the laws thereof, but was dependent upon the laws of the state of its creation, and had no existence separate therefrom. Further: The legislature

Godfrey v. Douglas County, 28 Or. 446, 43 Pac. 174.

The attack the plaintiff is attempting to make is a collateral attack, and the acts of the board of equalization in this case cannot be attacked in that way.

United States Trust Co. v. New York, 144 N. Y. 488, 39 N. E. 384; Burt v. Wadsworth, 39 Mich. 129.

Reavis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action by plaintiff, a private corporation, against defendants, to recover the sum of $553.99, claimed to have been illegally exacted for taxes upon the property of plaintiff for the year 1897, which taxes were paid under protest after seizure of property under a tax warrant. Plaintiff alleges two sums were illegally exacted,—one a tax of

was dealing with the subject of taxing foreign corporations doing business in this state, and taxing them only because they did business in this state, and having the right to tax them only on business done in this state. People v. Equitable Trust Co. 96 N. Y. 387, 393, 394.

In another case, Gray, J., of the same court, said that, as to corporations which are created under the laws of another state or country, jurisdiction for taxing purposes is gained from the business which they do in this state, and the tax is one upon that business. Foreign corporations coming into the state for the purpose of doing some part of their corporate business are placed under the obligation to bear some portion of the general burden of taxation in return for the privileges and benefits enjoyed. People ex rel. American Contracting & Dredging Co. v. Wemple, 129 N. Y. 558, 563, 29 N. E. 812.

And the same judge in a later case, referring to the same law, said: It imposes a tax upon every corporation organized pursuant to law in this state or in any other state or country and doing business in this state. The tax is to be paid on its franchise or business, and is not upon property, but on the corporate franchise of domestic, and on the business done here of foreign, corporations. People ex rel. Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik v. Roberts, 152 N. Y. 59, 36 L. R. A. 756, 46 N. E. 161.

And once more, in a later case still: So far as the franchises themselves of the foreign corporation are concerned, they are beyond the reach of our tax laws. They are derived from the governments to which they owe their creation, and can only be subjected to taxation by the laws of those governments. When it is sought to exercise them within this state the condition of the right to do so is the liability to taxation and control by the legislature so far as the capital can be seen to be employed here. People ex rel. A. J. Johnson Co. v. Roberts, 159 N. Y. 70, 74, 45 L. R. A. 126, 53 N. E. 685.

But the distinction has been rendered very nearly worthless by the declaration of the United States Supreme Court that the validity of an excise tax upon a corporation for the privilege of exercising its franchises within the state is not determined by the mode adopted in fixing its amount for any specific period or the times of its payment; the whole field of inquiry into the extent of revenue from sources

$132.50 on the franchise of the corporation; and an excessive tax of $421.49, arising from over assessment of plaintiff's personal property, without any opportunity for a hearing having been given before the board of equalization provided for by law. Plaintiff conceded that it ought to pay a tax on a valuation of $11,068 of $293.30, but alleged an excess exacted of $553.99. The case was tried by the court, and the material facts found are substantially that upon the 1st of March, 1897, plaintiff was the owner of personal property in Tacoma, which it duly listed as of the value of $11,068, but that the value of the personal property of plaintiff was largely in excess of that sum; that the county assessor assessed and valued the personal property of the plaintiff at the sum of $30,350, which included the valuation upon the franchise owned by the plaintiff at the sum of $5,000: that the plaintiff was the owner of a franchise granted by the city of Tacoma of the right to use the streets, highways, alleys, and avenues of the city over which to transmit and convey power and light to its customers, and the rights appertaining thereto; that about the 7th of August, 1897, plaintiff delivered to and filed with the auditor of Pierce county, as clerk of the board of equalization, its petition in writing, praying the board to reduce the assessments so made by the assessor to the sum of $11,068, and also praying that the item, "franchise assessed at $5,000" be stricken off the assessment of plaintiff's property on the ground that the same was illegal and double taxation, and the further reason that the franchisees of other corporations of like character were not assessed in at the command of the corporation is open to the consideration of the state in deciding what may justly be exacted for the privilege. Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 103.

Turning to the cases, the following illustrative rulings and applications of the principles adverted to are found:

A statute requiring foreign building and loan associations to pay annually into the state treasury 2 per cent of their gross receipts from business done within the state imposes a tax for the privilege of doing business. The tax is not upon the corporate franchise for the conclusive reason that the state did not grant this, but it is a tax on the franchise of doing business in the state, and in this sense a franchise tax. Southern Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Norman, 98 Ky. 294, 31 L. R. A. 41, 32 S. W. 952.

The existence and organization of a corporation and its endowed functions and capacities from the law creating it do not alone constitute the franchise or commodity which by the Massachusetts Constitution the legislature may subject to a duty or excise; hence, a statute taxing a foreign corporation, which has an office for directing its affairs and transferring its stock within the state, a percentage upon its entire capital stock at par is a valid exercise of legislative power. Atty. Gen. v. Bay State Min. Co. 99 Mass. 148, 96 Am. Dec. 717.

A statute providing that every corporation, joint-stock company, or association, domestic or foreign (with certain exceptions), shall be subject to and pay annually a state tax as a tax upon its corporate franchise or business, to be computed by a method therein set forth according to dividends when these amount to a stated percentage, and when they do not according to the value of the capital stock appraised as therein provided, so far as it taxes corporate franchises operates only upon domestic corporations, and as to foreign corporations the tax is solely upon the business done within the state. People v. Equitable Trust Co. 96 N. Y. 387.

A claim that only so much of the capital of a foreign corporation as is employed within the state, rather than its entire capital, should be taken as the basis of computing such tax is unfounded. The proposition is not affected by an amendment to the statute empowering the state comptroller in certain contingencies to determine the amount of capital stock that shall be the basis of the tax when part of it is employed without the state. People v. Horn Silver Min. Co. 105 N. Y. 76, 11 N. E. 155, 57 L. R. A.

Affirmed in 143 U. S. 305, 36 L. ed. 164, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 57, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403.

Such a tax is valid as against a foreign corporation doing any business in the state, without regard to the business it does, the amount of capital it employs therein, the amount of its stock held therein, or the extent of the benefits derived from or the protection afforded by the laws and agencies of the state. Ibid.

(The injustice here was ended by the enactment of a subsequent statute [Laws 1885, chap. 501] declaring in terms that the basis of such tax should be the amount of capital stock employed within the state.)

To the same effect, People ex rel. Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wemple, 131 N. Y. 64, 29 N. E. 1002.

The New York statutes for the taxation of the privileges and franchises of savings banks (Laws 1866, chap. 781, § 7; Laws 1867, chap. 861) do not apply to foreign ones. People ex rel. Savings Bank v. Coleman, 135 N. Y. 231, 31 N. E. 1022.

A foreign corporation cannot complain that it is subject to the same license taxes that are laid upon domestic corporations. Southern Car & Foundry Co. v. State (Ala.) 32 So. 235.

A foreign railroad corporation having an office or offices within the state which organizes and operates an express business over its road and beyond it is subject to a statute of such state requiring all express companies doing business therein to take out a license and pay both a specific and a percentage of income tax. Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. State, 9 Lea, 218, 42 Am. Rep. 673. The court reasoned out this result by saying that the real question was, Are the legitimate functions of a railroad and the express business identical, or are they distinct occupations when considered as businesses? We do not deem it necessary to go into the cases (which was a great pity). It suffices to say that both in fact and on authority we think it clear the two businesses are separate and distinct having many likenesses, it is true, but differences so well marked as to make them clearly distinguishable the one from the other. We shall not undertake to enumerate the points of likeness or difference in this opinion. All of which is a matter of regret, since, while it is perfectly plain that an express company is not a railroad, it is difficult to see why the carriage of freight at no matter what speed and by special contract with the shipper or otherwise is not legitimate railroading.

That a tax is called one upon the franchise does not affect its validity when laid upon a the county and state; and in said petition also prayed a hearing, that a time be fixed by the board, and that at the hearing part of the city council of the city of Tacoma, it being a city of the first class, should sit as a part of the board of equalization. The court also found that franchisees of other like corporations and persons were assessed in the county, and equalized by the board of equalization, and that there was no unjust discrimination in this regard against plaintiff, and that the county board of equalization for the year 1897 was composed of the three county commissioners, who duly qualified as members of such board; that the city council of the city of Tacoma appointed three members of the council to sit as a board of equalization during the year, but that the parties so appointed, and each of them, failed to present themselves or their credentials to the auditor of Pierce county, the clerk of the board of equalization, to offer to qualify and sit as members of the board, or as part thereof; that the petition of the plaintiff for reduction of its assessment as made by the county assessor was duly denied by the board of equalization; that the board thereafter duly notified plaintiff that its assessment would be raised from the amount fixed by the assessor to the sum of $31,973, unless plaintiff showed cause why it should not be raised in accordance with the notice; that the board at the hearing found that the value of the property was the sum of $31,973, and equalized its value at that amount; and that the board of equalization at said time was duly organized. The court also found that no members of the city council of Tacoma sat as members of the board of equalization for foreign corporation if in reality it rests upon property alone and that within the taxing state. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atty. Gen. 125 U. S. 530, 31 L. ed. 790, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961.

There was the same ruling in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Norman, 77 Fed. 13.

But the case was distinguished in San Francisco v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 96 Cal. 140, 17 L. R. A. 801, 31 Pac. 10, by pointing out that while the Massachusetts tax was held to be one upon the corporate property in that state although misnamed a franchise tax, and was therefore valid, the tax denounced in the California case was both in name and in fact a franchise tax pure and simple, and therefore void.

The assessing for taxation of the capital stock and franchisees of a foreign telegraph company operating both lines of its own and lines leased from a domestic corporation cannot be sustained as a penalty for failure to make a return, as required by law, of the capital stock and franchisees of its lessee. If, indeed, the capital stock and franchisees of a foreign corporation may be taxed in a state in which it does business, but under whose laws it was not created, the Illinois revenue act of March 30, 1872 (Rev. Stat., chap. 120) does not confer the necessary authority so to do. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Barnard, 37 Ill. App. 105. Following Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Lieb, 76 Ill. 172.

Although Michigan statutes in force have theretofore required foreign corporations, when permitted to do business in that state, to be subject to all the restrictions and liabilities of domestic ones, and have provided that an increase of the capital stock of a domestic corporation shall be operative from the time when the certificate is received by the secretary of state, act No. 79 of 1893 of that state, subjecting foreign corporations theretofore allowed to do business therein to payment of a franchise fee upon every increase of their capital stock, does not apply to such a corporation that had increased its stock before it was enacted, but had not filed its certificate to that effect until after it went into operation. Warren-Scharf Asphalt Paving Co. v. Secretary of State, 115 Mich. 234, 73 N. W. 107.

A statute revising and amending prior legislation, and imposing a privilege tax on express companies doing business in the state, and enacting that no company which has paid such tax shall be liable to pay any additional privilege tax or any other tax in the state, and which omits a saving clause found in the earlier acts respecting licenses by cities and towns, is so plainly inconsistent with a provision in a 57 L. R. A.

city charter giving power to license express companies that it operates as a repealer by implication. Douglas v. Anniston, 104 Ala. 291, 16 So. 138.

A statute requiring both domestic and foreign corporations annually to pay a specific license tax when their paid-up capital stock exceeds a named sum, bases the tax upon the entire capital stock actually engaged in the corporate business wherever carried on, not merely upon so much of it as may be employed in the state, and makes no distinction between foreign and domestic corporations. Southern Car & Foundry Co. v. State (Ala.) 32 So. 235.

2. Conditions upon the privilege of exercising corporate franchises.

The power of a state to exclude altogether from its territory a foreign corporation, or to permit it therein only on such terms and conditions as it may see fit to prescribe, to hamper it with any restrictions it chooses, and to subject it to any amount of taxation, however burdensome, at discretion, is usually asserted in the broadest terms.

To illustrate: The recognition of its existence by a state other than that which has created a corporation, and the enforcement of its contracts made therein, depend purely upon the comity of those states,—a comity never extended where the existence of the corporation, or the exercise of its powers, is prejudicial to their interests, or repugnant to their policy. Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357, Field, J.

The right of a corporation to engage in business in a state other than that of its creation depends solely upon the will of such state. Hooper v. California, 155 U. S. 648, 39 L. ed. 297, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 610, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 207.

The power of taxation is inherent in every sovereignty, and extends, not only to the people and property of a state, but it may be exercised upon every object brought within its jurisdiction. Stein v. Mobile, 24 Ala. 591.

All subjects over which the sovereignty of a state extends are subject to taxation, and the state sovereignty extends to everything which exists by its own authority or is introduced by its permission. Jones v. Page, 44 Ala. 657.

The legislature has the power to prescribe the terms upon which foreign corporations may be permitted to come into the state and carry on their business, or even to prohibit them altogether from so doing. This is a necessary corollary to the sovereign power to grant or rethe year 1897 for property within the city of Tacoma, but that three members of the city council appeared on the 4th of August, 1897, before the board, and in response to an interrogation as to their sitting as members of the board the chairman of the board as then organized replied that he thought the board of equalization was then legally organized, and denied the members of the council the right to sit. The complaint alleges no fraud on the part of the assessor or the board of equalization as constituted for the year 1897, and no evidence was introduced in support of any fraud committed by the assessor or the board in fixing the valuation of the property of plaintiff. The court, as legal conclusions, determined that the assessment for the taxation of plaintiff's property for the year 1897 as to the franchise valued at the sum of $5,000 was void, for the reason that franchises were not subject to taxation under the laws of this state, and that as to the balance of the property it was legally assessed and equalized; that plaintiff, by its appearance before the board of equalization without objection, in response to the notice to show cause why its assessment should not be raised, and failing to object at that time to the legality of the board, if any objection existed, waived its right to object to the board as then constituted, and that the failure of the members of the city council to appear and qualify or offer to qualify in no way affected the legality of the board of equalization as then constituted, and a decree was entered in favor of plaintiff for $132.50, with interest, on account of the tax collected upon the franchise. Both plaintiff and defendants excepted to the judgment,— fuse charters of incorporation, since otherwise irresponsible foreign corporations might force themselves upon a state which denied to domestic ones the same rights. People v. Thurber, 13 Ill. 554.

There is no doubt of the power of the legislature to impose taxation on foreign corporations to whatever extent it may choose as the condition upon which such corporations shall be allowed to exercise their franchises and privileges in the state. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Lieb, 76 Ill. 172.

Corporations created by the laws of one state have no rights in another except such as the latter may choose to confer upon such terms and conditions as it chooses to impose. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Com. 5 Bush, 68.

A state may lawfully impose upon foreign corporations seeking to do business within it any burdens, terms, and conditions it sees fit in consenting. State v. Lathrop, 10 La. Ann. 598.

Not only the manner of doing business, but the kinds of business which foreign corporations may do outside of their home jurisdictions, are entirely and unreservedly under the control of the local legislative authority. Dryden v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 60 Me. 512.

That the legislature has the power to tax a foreign corporation to any extent it pleases as a condition upon which such corporation may be permitted to exercise its franchise in the state is well-settled law. State v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 73 Me. 518.

The whole matter of admitting foreign corporations to do business in a state rests absolutely in the discretion of the legislature. The terms of admission may be reasonable or unreasonable. Admission once granted may be denied again at any time. Daggs v. Orient Ins. Co. 136 Mo. 382, 35 L. R. A. 227, 38 S. W. 85.

The power of a state over foreign corporations is clear. It may exclude them altogether, or admit them on such terms as it may prescribe. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Mayer, 28 Ohio St. 521.

Whether or not foreign insurance companies shall do business, or be forbidden to, in the state affects the public welfare, and the state may permit or prohibit them to do so at discretion; and, if it permits, may impose such conditions and restrictions as it sees fit. Fire Department of Milwaukee v. Heifenstein, 16 Wis. 136.

A state has a right to exclude a foreign corporation from doing business within it. Warren Mfg. Co. v. Etna Ins. Co. 2 Palma, 501, Fed. Cas. No. 17,206.

A foreign corporation coming into a state by its consent with a license to run a year to do business is within the licensing state for any given year only under the license and subject to the conditions prescribed by that state's laws. And as such state has the power to exclude it entirely, it has power to change the conditions of its admission at any time for the future, and to impose as a condition the payment of a new tax or a further tax as a license fee; and if the state imposes such license fee as a prerequisite for the future, the foreign corporation, until it pays it, is not admitted to the state nor within its jurisdiction, but is outside, at the threshold, seeking admission with consent not given. Fire Asso. of Philadelphia v. New York, 119 U. S. 110, 30 L. ed. 342, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 108.

But, notwithstanding this sweeping language, one finds when concrete cases come to be examined that it needs some slight qualification, and that the asserted power and right are not wholly unlimited.

There are many suggestions to this effect in the decisions.

A corporation created by one state can transact business in another only with the consent, express or implied, of the latter, which consent may be given upon such conditions as the state may see fit to impose not repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the United States or inconsistent with the rules of public law securing the jurisdiction and authority of each state from encroachment by all others, or contrary to that principle of natural justice which forbids condemnation without opportunity for defense. Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How. 404, 15 L. ed. 451.

The power of a state to discriminate between her own domestic corporations and those of other states desirous of doing business within her jurisdiction is clearly established and the nature or degree of discrimination belongs to the state to determine, subject only to such limitations on her sovereignty as may be found in the fundamental law of the Union. Ducat v. Chicago, 10 Wall. 410, 19 L. ed. 972.

No conditions can be imposed by the state which are repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. Barron v. Burnside, 121 U. S. 186, 30 L. ed. 915, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 295, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 931, Blatchford, J.

The only limitation upon the power of a state to exclude a foreign corporation from doing business within its limits, or from hiring offices for that purpose, or to exact conditions for allowing the corporation to do business or hire offices therein, arises where the corporation is in the employ of the Federal govern-the plaintiff to the allowance of any tax, and the defendants to the judgment for recovery of $132.50, amount collected as tax on the franchise.

1. The findings of fact made by the superior court seem to be sustained by the evidence. The suggestion of discrimination in the assessment of the franchise of plaintiff, if true, might be answered by a reference to the revenue laws and the provision for the assessment of property which has been omitted from the tax roll. But the court has found that such discrimination did not, in fact, exist. It is not competent for plaintiff to make a collateral attack here upon the composition of the board of equalization. Upon notice duly given from the board, it appeared, and was heard upon the valuation of its property fixed by the assessor, and raised no objection to the manner in which the board was constituted; and therefore we think the equalization of the assessment was properly made, and, in the absence of any allegation of fraud, such equalization of the value of personal property is conclusive.

2. The important question is brought here by defendants. The superior court concluded that a franchise was not subject to taxation under the laws of this state. The state Constitution (article 7, § 1) declares: "All property in the state not exempt under the laws of the United States, or under this Constitution, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law." The revenue laws of 1897 (p. 136) provide: "All real and personal property now existing, or that shall be hereafter created or brought into this state, shall be subject to assessment and taxament, or where its business is strictly commerce, interstate or foreign. Pembina Consol. Silver Min. & Mill. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 81 L. ed. 650, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 24, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 737.

The power of a state to make discriminations in privileges granted to foreign corporations may be exercised where a foreign company desires to do business within the limits of the state not strictly interstate or foreign commerce. Such corporations may be excluded from the state altogether in the legislative discretion. Such restrictions are permissible upon the ground that a state may not be willing, upon grounds of policy of its own, to have a corporation, even if legally created under the laws of its own state, establish a business in its borders, or it may demand a license tax or compliance with any other reasonable condition. But a most vital limitation in this respect upon the power of the state springs up where the business of the foreign corporation is commerce between the corporation, the creature of the legislature of one state and a citizen of another. As against all such foreign corporations engaged in interstate commerce, the state can pass no prohibitory law, constitutional or statutory, without impinging upon the commercial clause of the Constitution of the United States. McNaughton Co. v. McGlre, 20 Mont. 124, 38 L. ed. 367, 49 Pac. 651.

And finally, as remarked by Gray, J., of the New York court of appeals in a recent case, the state "cannot prevent the relator from exercising its franchise here as the owner of copyrights, for they are privileged and protected by the Federal Constitution. To concede a right to tax them would be to concede a power to impede or burden the operation of the laws enacted by Congress to carry into execution a power vested in the national government by the Constitution." People ex rel. A. J. Johnson Co. v. Roberts, 159 N. Y. 70, 75, 45 L. R. A. 126, 53 N. E. 685.

If a state does not enact any laws respecting the exclusion of foreign corporations, or put any restrictions upon their doing business within its borders, its consent to their entrance and doing business therein is implied. Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274.

If, however, one looks for consistency, the result is disappointment. The Supreme Court (with a strong dissent it is true), as late as 1891, is found declaring that the privilege of exercising the franchises of a corporation is a valuable one, and as the granting of it rests entirely within the legislative discretion, whether the corporation be of domestic or foreign origin, it may be conferred upon such conditions, pecuniary or otherwise, as to the state may appear most conducive to its interests or policy, among which conditions is the requirement of the payment into the state treasury each year of a specific sum, or of an apportioned amount according to the value of the business permitted as disclosed by its gains or receipts of the present or past years, in a case where the subject of a tax was a railroad engaged exclusively in both foreign and interstate commerce, the privilege of carrying on which the taxing state had neither power to confer nor the right to deny. Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 984, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 163.

This is the more bewildering, since the court, in the same breath, affirmed that its decision in no way qualified the former one in Philadelphia & S. Mall SS. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326, 340, 342, 30 L. ed. 1200, 1203, 1204, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 308, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1118, in which it had said of a similar tax: "If intended as a tax on the franchise of doing business,—which in this case is the business of transportation in carrying on interstate and foreign commerce,—it would clearly be unconstitutional." And that "it was held by this court in the case of Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 382, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 826, that interstate commerce carried on by corporations is entitled to the same protection against state exactions which is given to such commerce when carried on by individuals." And, finally: "It is hardly necessary to add that the tax on the capital stock of the New Jersey Company, in that case [The Gloucester Ferry Co.] was decided to be unconstitutional because, as the corporation was a foreign one, the tax could only be construed as a tax for the privilege or franchise of carrying on its business, and that business was interstate commerce."

In the light of all this, the investigator must be content with a statement of the decisions in the separate cases as they have arisen, and not attempt to deduce therefrom any masterful principle to control the future cases as they come up.

There have been the following rulings in point:

State statutes forbidding insurance companies incorporated elsewhere from carrying on business within the state without a previous license to do so, obtainable only by depositing with the state treasurer bonds of a specified character to the amount of $30,000 and upwards according to the capital employed, and forbidding anybody without a license to act as tion." Section 3 of the same act provides: "Personal property for the purposes of taxation shall be construed to embrace and include, without specifically defining or enumerating it, all goods, chattels, moneys, stocks or estate; all improvements upon lands, the fee of which is still vested in the United States, or in the state of Washington, or in any railroad company or corporation, and all and singular of whatsoever kind, name, nature and description, which the law may define or the courts interpret, declare and hold to be personal property, for the purpose of taxation, and as being subject to the laws, and under the jurisdiction of the courts of this state, whether the same be any marine craft, as ships and vessels, or other property holden under the laws and jurisdiction of the courts of this state, be the same at home or abroad.

Section 8 provides: "Personal property shall be listed in the manner following: First, every person of full age and sound mind, being a resident of this state, shall list all his moneys, notes, accounts, bonds or stock, shares of stock of joint stock or other companies (when the property of such company is not assessed in the state), franchises, royalties, and other personal property." Section 5202, Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Stat., declares that all franchises of every kind and nature are subject to sale upon execution and sale upon foreclosure of mortgage, in the same manner as any other personal property. That a franchise is property cannot be questioned, and that, unless it is exempted from taxation, it is liable to assessment, is equally correct. No argument is made here by counsel for plaintiff that agent for any foreign insurance company under a penalty of a fine for each offense, are not repugnant to that provision of the United States Constitution declaring the citizens of each state entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states. Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357.

The decision in this case was followed in, and controlled. Ducat v. Chicago, 10 Wall. 410, 19 L. ed. 972.

A state statute forbidding all foreign corporations (except insurance companies) which do not invest and use their capital within the state to have an office or offices therein for the use of their officers, stockholders, agents, or employees, without first obtaining a license for which an annual payment of a quarter of a mill on every dollar of the authorized capital stock was required, imposes a tax for the privilege accorded of doing business in the state, and not a tax upon a franchise not granted by, nor one upon property not within the jurisdiction of, the taxing state. Pembina Consol. Silver Min. & Mill. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 31 L. ed. 650, 2 Intera. Com. Rep. 24, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 737.

A charge imposed as a condition by a state upon the taking of corporate being or the exercise of corporate franchises by foreign railroads upon consolidation with a domestic railroad, the right to which depends solely upon the will of the state, is not an attempt to tax property beyond the jurisdiction. Ashley v. Ryan, 153 U. S. 436, 38 L. ed. 773, 4 Intera. Com. Rep. 664, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865.

A license issued to a foreign life insurance company to do business in a state, and the payment of the license taxes or fees required therefor, does not exonerate the licensee when it loans out at interest its premium receipts as its charter authorizes and as an incident to its insurance business, and when it does not do business generally as a money lender, from liability to pay an additional license charge made by the state upon all corporations engaging in banking, loaning money at interest, buying and selling notes and securities, etc. State v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. (Idaho) 67 Pac. 647.

It is competent for the legislature of a state to require every person acting in one of the cities thereof, as agent for a foreign insurer against fire losses, to pay annually for public use a percentage of the premiums received or promised for insurances effected or agreed upon in such city. Firemen's Benev. Assn. v. Lounsbury, 21 Ill. 511, 74 Am. Dec. 115, Following People v. Thurber, 13 Ill. 554; Ducat v. Chicago, 48 Ill. 172, 95 Am. Dec. 529, Affirmed on 57 L. R. A.

error, 10 Wall. 410, 19 L. ed. 972. To the same effect, Hughes v. Cairo, 92 Ill. 339.

Inasmuch as the state may exclude altogether from its territory foreign insurance companies, or admit them to do business within its borders upon any terms and conditions it may see fit to impose, such an insurance company cannot contest a municipal license tax upon its agency in the city exacting it under a charter power on the ground that it has sustained all the state burdens. It is within the power of the state, not only to require payments to itself from foreign corporations seeking an entrance, but also to every local political corporation wherein it may establish itself. Leavenworth v. Booth, 15 Kan. 627.

States may impose upon foreign corporations any terms or burdens as conditions of entering their territory and doing business therein irrespective of their treatment of domestic corporations and regardless of the provisions of state constitutions requiring uniformity of property taxation, and of the Federal Constitution respecting the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens in the several states. Com. v. Milton, 12 B. Mon. 212, 54 Am. Dec. 522.

Although it is settled law that, so far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, states may impose upon foreign insurance companies seeking to enter their territory and do business within it, such terms as they may see fit as conditions upon which permission so to do is given, it is nevertheless true that provisions in the state constitution protect foreign, equally with domestic, corporations from unconstitutional taxation. Parker v. North British & M. Ins. Co. 42 La. Ann. 428, 7 So. 599.

The purchase of the stock, property, and business of a domestic corporation having a paid-for license to do business as such does not give the purchaser—a foreign corporation—authority to continue the business without a license of its own. Southern Car & Foundry Co. v. State (Ala.) 32 So. 235.

When a state invests its superintendent of insurance with discretionary power to refuse a license to a foreign insurance company seeking to enter and do business in the state whenever in his judgment such refusal shall best promote the interests of the people of his state, such officer may exercise his power arbitrarily, and exclude a foreign insurance company when it applies for a renewal of its license after having held one and done business under it for a number of years, where the home state thereof has adopted a statute of retaliation and reciprocity, imposing burdensome obligaany law of this state exempts franchises from taxation; but it is maintained by counsel that no statute can be found specifically providing a method of ascertaining the value of franchises, and their objection to this tax seems to be founded upon the absence of such provision for ascertainment of the value of franchises. Almost this precise question seems to have been determined by the supreme court of Wisconsin in the case of State ex rel. Milwaukee Street R. Co. v. Anderson, 90 Wis. 550, 63 N. W. 746. There a street-railway company was assessed upon its personal property, specifying cars, motors, snow plows, sweepers, and other vehicles, and all other personal property, and also franchises. The court observed: "It is contended on behalf of the railway company that its franchises are not liable to assessment and taxation, for the reason that no provision or rule has been enacted for their valuation. . . . It was not denied—indeed, it was rightly conceded—that the franchises of the street-railway company are property. It is believed that there is no authority to the contrary, nor is it seriously questioned but that the franchises of the company, and its property of whatever kind, necessary or essential to their exercise and use to carry out the purposes for which it was created, are in law an entirety, and indivisible, and not subject to severance by sale for taxes under the general operation of the tax laws or other legal process. . . . The method of taxation in this state is upon the valuation of property taxed, and the statute does not provide for a certain, specific tax on franchises, like an excise rate, and known as a franchise tax, under methods of taxation in tions and restrictions upon, and subjecting to fines and penalties, a like company incorporated in such officer's own state. Talbot v. Fidelity & C. Co. 74 Md. 536, 13 L. R. A. 584, 22 Atl. 395.

As a state may rightfully deny to foreign corporations permission to do business, hold property, or exercise any corporate functions whatever within its limits, or may allow them such privileges upon such terms as it sees fit to prescribe, it may lawfully impose a franchise tax—i. e., an excise or duty upon a commodity—upon such as have offices or places of business for directing their affairs and transferring their stocks, and make the exaction a percentage of the par value of the entire capital stock whether employed within the state or not, or owned by residents or nonresidents. Atty Gen. v. Bay State Min. Co. 99 Mass. 148, 98 Am. Dec. 717.

When a foreign insurance company enters a state to do business, where there are no domestic companies of the same kind, it is to be presumed that it does so in view of the public law thereof, taxing the gross premiums received within the state and in submission thereto, and that all its transactions with its agents and others will be made with regard to such law. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Omaha, 23 Neb. 312, 36 N. W. 522.

New Jersey subjected, by a statute enacted in 1884 (Supp. Rev. 1016), foreign corporations doing business in that state to an annual license tax, not an imposition in compensation for the grant of a franchise by the state, but for use of its franchises within the state. State, Tide-Water Pipe Line Co., Prosecutor, v. Berry, 52 N. J. L. 308, 19 Atl. 665.

A foreign corporation taxed because of doing business in a state other than that of its origin may be subjected to a specific impost which is not harmful when, though arbitrary, it is measured by its ability to pay. It cannot complain that the method of computing it is not based upon an apportionment or appraisal, either of business done, capital employed, or dividends paid within the state. But it must be imposed only on business done within the state; if imposed on all the business of the corporation it is conceded that it cannot be enforced. And such a corporation cannot, outside of its home state, be taxed by another state in reference to property or business not within the limits of the latter, nor on account of its corporate franchises, since these were not given by the latter state, and were dependent only upon the laws of the state that created the corporation, and were without exist-

A corporation employing some or all of its capital in a state other than that which gave it being, and thus having the benefit and protection of the government and laws of such other state to the extent of its investment therein, is justly subject to the same burdens and obligations of taxation in such other state as is a corporation domestic thereto. People, ex rel. Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wemple, 131 N. Y. 64, 29 N. E. 1002.

When a tax laid upon such a corporation is measured by the amount of capital employed in the state, it is not imposed upon its property, but for the privilege extended to it by the taxing state of doing business therein as a corporation, and in its corporate name. Ibid.

The jurisdiction to impose such a tax is gained by reason of the business which the foreign corporation is privileged to do in the taxing state under the protection of its laws. People ex rel. A. J. Johnson Co. v. Roberts, 159 N. Y. 70, 74, 45 L. R. A. 126, 53 N. E. 685, Gray, J.

A tax of that kind is levied upon a foreign corporation for the privilege of exercising its corporate franchises or carrying on its business in the taxing state. Ibid., Vann, J.

The Ohio statute of May 14, 1894 (91 Ohio Laws, 237), imposing an excise tax for the privilege of carrying on the express business in that state, is valid. Adams Exp. Co. v. State, 55 Ohio St. 69, 44 N. E. 506.

A foreign corporation can do business in Ohio only upon such terms and conditions as the state may impose; and therefore a franchise tax may be imposed upon a foreign corporation for the privilege of doing business in the state. Southern Gum Co. v. Laylin (Ohio) 64 N. E. 564.

A state has a right to require the treasurer of each foreign corporation that does business within its borders, whenever his company pays interest on any scrip, bond, or certificate of indebtedness issued to and held by residents of such state, to assess a state tax thereon upon the face value of each security, and to compel the deduction thereof from the interest payments and the payment thereof into the state treasury. A law so providing is a valid exercise of the power to prescribe conditions upon which a foreign corporation may come into and do business within the state. Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 129 Pa. 463, 18 Atl. 412. This case followed Com. v. Delaware Division Canal Co. 123 Pa. 594, 2 L. R. A. 798, 16 Atl. 584, and Com. v. Lehigh Valley R. Co.

use in many of the states. 'In some states,' says Mr. Cooley in his work on Taxation (p. 383), 'all taxation, as far as possible, is brought to an ad valorem standard. Franchises are property, and in such states may be taxed by valuation, being estimated for the purpose either separately or as a part of the aggregate corporate property.' State Bd. of Assessors v. Central R. Co. 48 N. J. L. 283, 288, 347, 4 Atl. 578. They have a value which can be estimated, and this is the proper duty of the assessor or the board of review. In State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 603, 23 L. ed. 669, it is laid down: "That the franchise, capital stock, business, and profits of all corporations are liable to taxation in the place where they do business, and by the state which creates them, admits of no dispute at this day. "Nothing can be more certain in legal decisions," says this court in Society for Savings v. Coite, 6 Wall. 607, 18 L. ed. 902, "than that the privileges and franchises of a private corporation . . . may be taxed by a state for the support of the state government." State Freight Tax Case, 15 Wall. 232, 21 L. ed. 146; State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 284, sub nom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 164. In Raleigh & G. R. Co. v. Reid, 13 Wall. 268, 20 L. ed. 570, the court says that 'nothing is better settled than that the franchise of a private corporation—which, in its application to a railroad, is the privilege of running it, and taking fare and freight—is property, and of the most valuable kind.' And in Morgan v. Louisiana, 93 U. S. 223, 23 L. ed. 861, it is said that they "are rights or privileges which are essential to the operations of the corporation, and without 129 Pa. 429, 18 Atl. 406, 410, upon all the points raised therein, and then held, in addition, that the statute sub judice applied to foreign as well as domestic corporations.

The same ruling was made in Com. v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 150 Pa. 245, 24 Atl. 599.

There was a ruling to the same effect, again, in Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 139 Pa. 457, 21 Atl. 528; but this case was reversed in the United States Supreme Court. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 153 U. S. 628, 38 L. ed. 846, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 952. The point was not affected, however, since the reversal went upon the ground that the state had bargained with the plaintiff in error for a consideration of value for the extension of its road within its territory, and the law in question would impair the obligation of this contract; and upon the further ground that, as the railroad paid its interest in New York, these payments, even when made to Pennsylvanians, were beyond the taxing jurisdiction of Pennsylvania.

3. What is doing business or employing capital within the state and the meaning of tax laws.

It is not easy in any given case to say whether or not a corporation is doing business or employing capital within a state where it did not originate, so as to be subject to a franchise tax imposed thereby upon foreign corporations for the privilege of doing business within its limits. In New York, in particular, where the courts have long and consistently held that the jurisdiction to impose taxes at all upon foreign corporations depends upon the fact that they employ capital or do business, or are privileged so to do, in that state, the controversy over this question has been unceasing, and a final answer to it is still awaited. Illustrative cases will make this clear.

The act of February 27, 1855, provided that all persons and associations doing business in the state of New York as merchants, bankers, or otherwise, either as principals or partners, general or special, and not residents of the state, should be assessed and taxed on all sums invested in any manner in said business the same as if they were residents. A foreign corporation which manufactured nails in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and had a depot and agent in the city of New York to which it sent nails for sale, and whose only business in New York state was making such sales, and at once remitting the proceeds thereof to the home office, and when these were on credits the securities and accounts therefor for collection, was assessed and taxed by the city tax com- 57 L. R. A. missioners under that statute because its sales in that city aggregated $300,000 annually, and its sales agent had on hand for sale $10,000 worth of its product. It was held that this did not constitute doing business in the state of New York, or rather having any investment in business in such state within the tax law. That merely sending goods into the state to be sold did not subject a foreign corporation to any tax under that law. People ex rel. Parker Mills v. New York Tax & A. Comrs. 23 N. Y. 245.

This decision was followed and approved soon afterwards by a court nearly evenly divided (four to three) in holding that a foreign banking corporation having, not a branch, but a mere agency, within the state to which it intrusted funds and securities for temporary employment until they were required elsewhere, they being a part of a general fund reserved to meet shortly maturing and unexpected liabilities at home, and which were at all times subject to draft and under the control of the officers at home, and which had no permanent capital whatever invested in such agency or in any business within the state of New York, and where such agency did not issue bills nor receive deposits nor do any business whatever save loaning on call or short time the funds sent to it,—was not taxable under such statute. People ex rel. Bank of Montreal v. New York Tax & A. Comrs. 59 N. Y. 40, Reversing 1 Thomp. & C. 680.

The decision in the Parker Mills Case was also followed in People ex rel. Sherwin-Williams Co. v. Barker, 5 App. Div. 246, 39 N. Y. Supp. 151, Affirmed without opinion in 149 N. Y. 623, 44 N. E. 1128, where the facts were much the same.

This last case expressly overruled People ex rel. Martin Bros. Mfg. Co. v. Barker, 14 Misc. 382, 36 N. Y. Supp. 76, which had held the contrary.

But a foreign insurance company that has ceased to do aught but collect premiums and pay losses on outstanding policies is still doing business within such statute so as to be subject to taxation thereunder. Smyth v. International Life Assur. Co. 35 How. Pr. 126.

A foreign mining corporation whose executive officers have offices in New York, whose directors hold annual meetings, and whose dividends are declared and paid in that state; whose silver bullion is all sent and sold there and the price of it deposited in banks there, in part, and in part loaned there and in part used there for corporate purposes, all continuously throughout an entire year,—is doing business which its road and works would be of little value. . . . They are positive rights or privileges, without the possession of which the road of the company could not be successfully worked. Immunity from taxation is not one of them.' Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Miller, 114 U. S. 186, 29 L. ed. 124, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 813; Sterling Gas Co. v. Higby, 134 Ill. 557, 25 N. E. 660; Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 110; Central P. R. Co. v. State Board of Equalization, 60 Cal. 35; Veasie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 547, 19 L. ed. 487. We have the general and paramount provision making franchises taxable. Legislative direction as to the manner of valuation is a convenience, rather than an absolute necessity, and the lack of such direction does not argue the absence or suspension of the general power to tax. The value of franchises, especially in connection with the property reasonably necessary for their exercise and use, and which, without them, would be of little or no practical value, can be estimated as well as the value of other subjects of taxation, though perhaps not as readily, or with the same degree of certainty. The cardinal requirement is that, as property, they shall be taxed. All else is matter of method and detail. The assessors, board of review, and other officers would seem to be competent, under their general powers under the law, to fix their value and extend the tax." The Supreme Court of the United States, in Society for Savings v. Coite, 6 Wall. 594, 18 L. ed. 897, observes, with reference to the taxation of franchises: "Such a power resides in government as a part of itself, and need not be reserved when property of any description, or the right to in that state within the meaning of a tax law thereof, imposing a franchise or business tax upon domestic corporations and foreign ones doing business within its limits. People v. Horn Silver Min. Co. 105 N. Y. 76, 11 N. E. 155, Affirming 38 Hun, 276, and Affirmed on Error in 143 U. S. 305, 36 L. ed. 164, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 57, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403.

A foreign corporation chartered to manufacture, own, sell, use, and license others to use electric speaking telephones and other apparatus and appliances pertaining to the transmission of intelligence by electricity, whose entire business practically consists in manufacturing under its patents in its home state and leasing to and licensing others to use telephones elsewhere under elaborate contracts made at its home office providing for royalties and license fees payable at such home office, from which are shipped the telephones required by the licensees, and to which these when done with are returned, but which leaves the entire local business to be carried on by, and the entire local receipts to be collected by, the licensees, except it reserves in its contract certain rights to interfere on default of payment of royalties and rentals, or, when needful, to protect its patent rights,—is not doing business outside of the state where its domicile is and within that of a local corporation it has licensed, and therefore is not taxable under such a statute. People v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 117 N. Y. 241, 22 N. E. 1057, Reversing 50 Hun, 114, 3 N. Y. Supp. 733.

A foreign corporation that maintains a sales agency in another state, where it sells the products of its mills, and where it refines crude oil, keeps a warehouse for storage of its stock, and large sums for business purposes on deposit in a local bank, is doing business in such state, and subject to taxation under a statute thereof taxing foreign corporations that do business therein upon the amount of capital they employ therein. People ex rel. Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wemple, 131 N. Y. 64, 29 N. E. 1002.

This view was the same one taken by the Federal court in that state. Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wemple, 44 Fed. 24.

It is somewhat noteworthy that after these decisions this corporation changed its methods of doing business in New York, and thereby succeeded (for a time at least) in avoiding this tax. It discontinued its New York office and entered into an arrangement with a firm of commission brokers making them its selling agents for the state, for the eastern and for foreign markets, on a commission of a certain per cent of the sales. The brokers obtained orders and sent them to the company for approval. If these were approved shipments to fill them were in the majority of cases made direct from the mills outside of New York. The company also consigned to the brokers for sale, if a named price could be obtained, an average of 400 to 500 barrels of oil per month, some of which was for consumption in the state of New York, but all of which was sold in original packages. The company also had a New York bank account, but used it wholly without the state except to pay brokers' commissions. It was held that all this did not constitute doing business within the state of New York within said tax law. People ex rel. Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Roberts, 25 App. Div. 13, 48 N. Y. Supp. 1023.

That a foreign railroad corporation keeps buildings and other structures and a force of clerks and laborers and a local bank account at its terminal on the edge of the state for the sole purpose of transacting its business as a carrier of freight and passengers to and from other states does not make it a doer of business within the latter state, or subject it to taxation under such statute. People ex rel. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Wemple, 65 Hun, 232, 20 N. Y. Supp. 287, Affirmed in 138 N. Y. 1, 19 L. R. A. 694, 33 N. E. 720.

But when that same railroad establishes a cab service, and owns and uses cabs to convey actual or potential passengers from or to its terminus in the city of New York upon fares independent of the railroad tickets, it becomes, to the extent of the capital it employs in such cab service, subject to the tax imposed by New York upon foreign corporations for the privilege of exercising corporate franchises or doing business in an organized capacity within its limits, to be computed upon the basis of the capital employed within the state. People ex rel. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Knight, 171 N. Y. 354, 64 N. E. 152, Affirming 67 App. Div. 308, 73 N. Y. Supp. 700.

A foreign manufacturing corporation engaged in building, equipping, and repairing steamships and railway cars in the state of its origin, where all its officers and everyone financially interested in it reside, which makes all its contracts, sells and delivers all its output, keeps all its books and accounts, makes all its deposits in bank at its home office, and which in New York merely hires an office for a salaried agent and as a convenient place to meet patrons and to make preliminary arrangements for contracts that are finally closed at its home office, and which has no property there but office furniture of trifling value, and pays all the expenses thereof, including the agents' sal-use it in any manner, is granted to individuals or corporate bodies. . . . The privileges and franchises of a private corporation are as much the legitimate subject of taxation as any other property of the citizens which is within the sovereign power of the state. Repeated decisions of this court have held, in respect to such corporations, that the taxing power of the state is never presumed to be relinquished, and, consequently, that it exists unless the intention to relinquish it is declared in clear and unambiguous terms." But it will be observed, upon examination of the authorities mentioned in the case of State ex rel. Milwaukee Street R. Co. v. Anderson, 90 Wis. 550, 63 N. W. 746, that it is a settled principle that franchises are subject to taxation, and it is a firmly established rule in this state that all property not specifically exempt by law is subject to taxation. We therefore conclude that the objection to the assessment and taxation of corporate franchises is not tenable, and we think the objection to the assessment because the method has not been prescribed by the legislature is sufficiently answered by the supreme court of Wisconsin, supra. In the case of Com. v. New England Slate & Tile Co. 13 Allen, 391, the supreme court of Massachusetts said: ". . . . And the fact that the defendant corporation held property which was subject to the burden of taxation in other ways does not render this tax upary, by checks drawn at home on a bank there located, neither employs capital, nor does business, in New York, and hence is not taxable therein. People ex rel. Harlan & H. Co. v. Campbell, 139 N. Y. 68, 34 N. E. 753.

Merely keeping an office and samples, but no stock, therein, without investing any capital in the state of New York, where orders for goods manufactured without the state are taken and sent to the home office in the state of its origin to be there filled if approved, does not render a foreign corporation taxable as doing business or employing capital in the state of New York. People ex rel. Washington Mills Co. v. Roberts, 8 App. Div. 201, 40 N. Y. Supp. 417.

But a foreign corporation organized under the laws of a foreign country, where it carries on all its corporate business, and where everybody interested in it resides, and which has no office, no property, no employee, and no transactions in the United States, and which has contributed a sum of money to a partnership of individuals as a part of the capital of a supposed limited partnership engaged in the importation and sale of the corporation's products and acting as its agents to sell them, the whole partnership business being exclusively managed and controlled by the individual partners, and the title to all its assets being in the firm as such,—is embraced within a statute of the state where such partnership carries on business enacted after said sum was contributed providing for the taxation of domestic corporations upon their corporate franchise and of foreign ones doing business in such state on their business within the state, according, in either case, to the amount of capital employed therein. People ex rel. Badische-Anilin & Soda Fabrik v. Roberts, 152 N. Y. 59, 36 L. R. A. 756, 46 N. E. 161, Affirming 11 App. Div. 810, 42 N. Y. Supp. 502. Two judges out of five dissented in the court below, and one, O'Brien, J., on appeal. He based his dissent upon the ground that the relator beyond all dispute was not doing business in the state of New York, and he referred to the earlier case of People v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 117 N. Y. 241, 22 N. E. 1057, where the relator therein, though furnishing most of the capital to and holding stock in domestic corporations, was declared not within the same statute for that very reason, stated, in the language of the court, "that for one person to supply the means to another to do business is not the doing of that business by the former," and he was unable to see why that decision did not control the one at bar. And many people will be inclined to agree with him, assuming the cited case to be sound.

A foreign brewing corporation that keeps in New York city and Brooklyn an agent to solicit orders, which it fills by shipments direct from its brewery in an adjoining state; that has its agent deposit to its credit in a local bank his collections where its average balance is $500; and that has in Brooklyn a storehouse where its casks from the brewery are temporarily placed over night pending delivery or return, but from which no sales were made,—is not doing business or employing capital in the state of New York, so as to be taxable therein. People ex rel. Lembeck & B. E. Brewing Co. v. Roberts, 22 App. Div. 282, 47 N. Y. Supp. 949.

In order that a foreign corporation may be taxed in the state of New York under a statute thereof making every corporation organized under the laws of any other state or foreign country and doing business in New York subject to taxation therein upon its capital stock upon the basis of the amount thereof employed therein, two concurrent conditions must exist: (1) The corporation must be doing business in the state; and (2) its capital, or a part of it, must be employed there. People ex rel. Chicago Junction R. & U. Stockyards Co. v. Roberts, 154 N. Y. 1, 47 N. E. 974, Reversing 90 Hun, 474, 35 N. Y. Supp. 968. The court sharply divided, four to three, in this case, not upon the proposition, but whether or not both conditions were fulfilled. The dissentients held they were; the majority that but one of them was. Their view was that the relator employed none of its capital in the state; that at most it employed only surplus, and surplus, as settled in the Singer Case, 150 N. Y. 46, 44 N. E. 787, was not capital, nor taxable as such.

The relator in that case was a foreign investment company. Four fifths of its directors were not residents of New York. The office where its annual meetings of stockholders were held was maintained in its home state. It had invested its whole capital in purchasing the stock and bonds of another foreign corporation of a distant state, entirely separate and distinct from itself, which in such distant state transacted all its business and declared and paid all its dividends. The relator derived its whole income from this investment, and had no other business; but it rented and furnished an office in New York, employed there and paid the salaries of a treasurer, secretary, clerk, and stenographer; it mailed from there to its stockholders checks for their dividends drawn upon a New York bank; it kept a bank account in New York with a large balance, and it had constituted such bank its transfer agent. It was held that it was not taxable; that, although it could be said to do business, it employed no capital in New York, and both were essential.

A foreign corporation engaged in loaning money on bonds and mortgages in its home and other western states, and in selling in Eastern markets bonds or debentures based thereon, on its franchise illegal." See also Com. v. Lovell Gaslight Co. 12 Allen, 75. The court of appeals of New York, in Monroe County Sav. Bank v. Rochester, 37 N. Y. 367, said: "The powers and privileges which constitute the franchises of a corporation are, in a just sense, property, and quite distinct and separate from the property which, by the use of such franchises, the corporation may acquire. They are so regarded by the law, and so regarded by common acceptance. And, although it has not heretofore been customary, in this state at least, to subject them to taxation, yet it must be conceded that it may be done if the legislature see fit so to enact." We can find no more practical difficulty in the assessment and valuation of a corporate franchise by competent officers under our revenue laws than in some other kinds of personal property which is taxed in this state. Some difficulty or perplexity arises in the valuation of much incorporeal property for taxation.

It is concluded, therefore, that the franchise of plaintiff was properly assessed, and the judgment of the Superior Court is reversed and remanded, with direction to enter judgment for defendants.

which maintains in New York an office, and has from the banking department of that state a license to carry on its business therein, and whose business at such office is the sale of the securities it deals in, and sending the proceeds west for reinvestment, the securities being constantly replenished, and which keeps a bank account in New York,—is doing business in that state, and employing capital to the average amount of the securities it carries there, as much as if such securities were merchandise; and hence, is subject to the New York franchise tax upon its business. People ex rel. New England Loan & T. Co. v. Roberts, 25 App. Div. 16, 49 N. Y. Supp. 10. Affirmed on opinion below in 156 N. Y. 688, 50 N. E. 1120.

That a foreign corporation has an office in New York, where it keeps samples of its goods to the amount of $4,000, and also has there a bank account with about as much of an average balance, all as incidents to the taking of orders for its products to be filed at its factory in another state, although it does have about $500 worth of odds and ends of materials to make repairs with at such New York office, does not render it taxable under such statute. People ex rel. H. B. Smith Co. v. Roberts, 27 App. Div. 455, 50 N. Y. Supp. 355.

A foreign corporation engaged in the state of its origin in making up and printing the insides or outsides of newspapers for local newspapers published in different parts of the Union, the publishers of which pay the corporation at its home office a certain price therefor, and complete the same by printing the blank pages with matter of their own and supplying their local patrons, and which does in New York no business except at an office rented to make contracts with advertisers in its portion of the paper for its own benefit and collect what is due therefor, which it temporarily banks therein, is not taxable under such statute. People ex rel. A. N. Kellogg Newspaper Co. v. Roberts, 30 App. Div. 150, 51 N. Y. Supp. 866.

When a foreign corporation, in compliance with a statute to that effect, applies for a license to do business within the state of New York, filing for the purpose a copy of its charter, and designating a principal place of business within the state and a person thereat upon whom legal process against it may be served, and obtains the license applied for, it affords conclusive evidence of an intention to make the designated place a permanent and continuous place of business, and not a mere depot for temporary storage of its property pending sale; and therefore it is taxable as doing business at such place and employing capital there to the amount of its stock of merchandise carried there, although a part of this was manufactured without the state and sent in to it for 57 L. R. A. sale. People ex rel. Armstrong Cork Co. v. Barker, 157 N. Y. 159, 51 N. E. 1043.

The general transactions of the relator in that case were similar to those of the company in People ex rel. Parker Mills v. New York Tax & A. Comrs. 23 N. Y. 242, and the relator in People ex rel. Sherwin-Williams Co. v. Barker, 5 App. Div. 246, 39 N. Y. Supp. 151, which followed it. These cases were accordingly distinguished.

The Armstrong Cork Company did, however, do a part of its manufacturing within the state of New York, and a portion of its stock was domestic made. Yet this fact made no difference, since the decision was accepted as controlling in the case of a corporation which manufactured its entire stock without the state of New York, and whose actual transactions in it did not differ from those of the Parker Mills Case. As it had applied for and received the license, it was, notwithstanding, held taxable. People ex rel. Crane Co. v. Feltner, 49 App. Div. 108, 62 N. Y. Supp. 1107.

The applying for and the issuing of the license is therefore deemed the controlling factor in this class of cases. This is seen by the decision in People ex rel. Reversible Collar Co. v. Feltner, 31 Misc. 553, 65 N. Y. Supp. 518, and emphatically so in the second Sherwin-Williams Company Case. People ex rel. Sherwin-Williams Co. v. Feltner, 60 App. Div. 628, 70 N. Y. Supp. 836.

The weakness of the later decisions appears to consist in assuming that applying for and obtaining a consent to do business is the same thing as doing business after permission is given; that in some way transactions that have for years been adjudicated to be neither doing business nor employing capital within the state are converted into both by asking permission and getting leave to do something else. These questions have not so frequently arisen in states other than New York.

A statute requiring a return, for the purposes of taxation, of the property of railroads operated within the state embraces depots, switchyards, shops, and side tracks used for railroad purposes within the state by means of a leased track, and belonging to a company whose main line is wholly outside of the state. Quincy, O. & K. C. R. Co. v. People ex rel. Corrigan, 156 Ill. 437, 41 N. E. 162.

Under a statute requiring every insurance company, firm, individual, or corporation doing and conducting an insurance business of any kind in the state, whether domiciled therein or merely operating through a branch department or agency of any kind, to pay a separate and distinct license tax on said business for every company represented, based upon the gross annual premiums received on risks within the state, and upon risks elsewhere upon which no licenses elsewhere are paid,—only the insurers and recipients of the premiums in their own right are personally liable; not the agents, who only procure risks and collect premiums for their principals. Such agents do not do or conduct an insurance business. State v. Woods, 40 La. Ann. 175, 3 So. 543.

When a foreign insurance company appoints an agent or agents within the state, and authorizes him or them to issue and reissue its policies and collect and receipt for its premiums, and also, in compliance with the state law, names an attorney to accept for it service of legal process, it is conducting an insurance business within the state, and, hence, is liable to taxation, state and local, imposed by statutes and ordinances upon such insurers; and this subject regardless of the fact that such agent or agents also represent a large number of other companies, and also insures or insure on his or their own account. State v. New England Mut. Ins. Co. 43 La. Ann. 133, 8 So. 888.

A foreign corporation owning, maintaining, and operating a pipe line across a state, a pumping station at one point, and storage tanks, distributing apparatus, and a business office at another within such state, is doing business therein within the meaning of a taxing law thereof applying to foreign corporations that do business within the state. Tide Water Pipe Co. v. State Bd. of Assessors, 57 N. J. L. 516, 27 L. R. A. 684, 31 Atl. 220.

Pennsylvania has been somewhat more prolific of controversy over this point.

Under statutes exacting annual license fees from foreign corporations which maintain offices without investing capital or carrying on business within the state, and imposing, instead, upon other foreign corporations taxes upon their capital stock employed within the state, a foreign corporation in the first class does not transfer itself to the second merely by purchasing a piece of real estate neither used nor necessary for its corporate business. That is not an investment of capital stock within the meaning of such statutes. Com. v. Conglomerate Min. Co. 1 Dauph. Co. Rep. 85.

A foreign corporation that owns no property but a United States patent covering a process for desulphuring ores and that actually does no business although authorized to exploit its process, except to grant licenses to others, is not liable to taxation out of its home state because it neither does business nor has a taxable situs in another state. Com. v. Davis-Colby Ore Roaster Co. 1 Dauph. Co. Rep. 118.

The purchasing of oil within, to ship to refineries without, a state is sufficiently doing business in such state to subject a foreign corporation to taxation therein. Com. v. Standard Oil Co. 101 Pa. 119.

The same conclusion that the New York court of appeals came to in the case of People v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 117 N. Y. 241, 22 N. E. 1037, was reached in Pennsylvania by the courts of that state, in the case of the same corporation under a similar tax law, namely, that the company was not doing business or employing capital, and hence was not taxable. Com. v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 1 Dauph. Co. Rep. 168; Com. v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 129 Pa. 217, 18 Atl. 122.

A railroad receiving gross earnings amounting to $9,000,000 for transporting passengers and freight, whose line is 455 miles long, of which 42½ miles are within a state other than that to which it owes its origin, is doing business in such foreign state within the terms of a statute thereof imposing a percentage tax upon the gross receipts of every railroad and steamboat company doing business in that 57 L. R. A.

state upon whose works freight may be transported. Erie R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 Wall. 492, 22 L. ed. 595.

4. Engaged in interstate commerce.

An extended discussion of state franchise taxes upon foreign corporations engaged to any extent whatever in foreign or interstate commerce 's not entered upon here. The subject has been relegated to a separate note upon corporate taxation as affected by the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. It suffices to say, generally, here that whenever a state law taxing foreign corporations for the privilege of carrying on their business within the taxing state casts a burden upon, or amounts to a regulation of, interstate or foreign commerce, it is void, and if in any given case a state tax rests upon such commerce it is invalid. Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 U. S. 727, 28 L. ed. 1137, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 739; Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158, 1 Intern. Com. Rep. 382, 5 Sup. Ct. The cases in which the taxation has been sustained are all where the law under which it was imposed had not the necessary effect to interfere with, burden, or in any wise regulate commerce, either interstate or foreign, and were such that the tax rested upon internal traffic only, or was a tax in reality, if not in form, upon property within the state, or, if for the privilege of doing business, attached to corporations which either did not do an interstate or foreign business at all, or were not exclusively engaged in such commerce. *Pembina Consol. A state franchise tax once paid by a foreign corporation to obtain a license to do business within the state when the only business it does or intends doing is interstate commerce cannot be recovered back. Moline Plow Co. v. Wilkinson, 105 Mich. 57, 62 N. W. 1119.

An apparent exception is the case of Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. Lesueur (Ariz.) 1 L. R. A. 244, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 189, 19 Pac. 157, where a tax laid by the territory of Arizona on the franchise granted by Congress to a transcontinental railroad engaged exclusively in interstate commerce was sustained. This case went on the ground, however, that a territory was not an independent sovereignty, and that its taxing act having been approved by Congress any interference thereby with commerce was by the consent of Congress itself, and therefore in harmony with the commerce clause.

But it must be conceded that the case of Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 163, is out of harmony with the above-stated principles. In that case the Supreme Court of the United States sustained the validity of a tax imposed by the state of Maine upon a foreign railway company engaged exclusively in interstate and international commerce for the privilege of carrying on its business in that state.

VIII. Limitations on franchise taxation.

a. Constitutional.

It is manifest that taxing statutes, like other enactments, are sometimes found to transcend the powers of the legislature as restricted by the constitution of its state. It is, of course, outside the present field of view to take note of any infringements of constitutional provisions that have not direct relation to the subject of taxation, and the field is also narrowed to include naught beyond laws subjecting corporations to franchise taxation. Almost every state constitution contains a provision requiring all property to be taxed by uniform laws according to its value, and to share equally in bearing the public burdens. But, although it is everywhere strongly insisted that corporate franchises are property for the purpose of taxation, it is unanimously held that they are not under the protection of such a provision, and that the legislative power of taxation over them is unlimited. Most of the state constitutions provide, in connection with such provision for ad valorem property taxation, that the legislature may tax franchises and exact license fees from occupations, provided the laws to that end operate uniformly upon all in the same class; but, as it is customarily regarded as competent for the legislature to create classes ad libitum, the protective power of such provisions is slight.

The provisions of the Alabama Constitution, requiring all taxes levied upon property to be assessed in exact proportion to the value of such property, and the property of private corporations, associations, and individuals to be forever taxed at the same rate, do not preclude the legislature from laying specific taxes upon franchisees, privileges, or occupations, since such provisions relate only to direct taxes upon property. Phoenix Carpet Co. v. State, 118 Ala. 143, 22 So. 627.

The Illinois constitutional requirement of the legislature to provide all needful revenue by levying a tax by valuation so that each taxpayer shall pay in proportion to the value of his property to be ascertained by persons appointed or elected as the legislature should direct, and not otherwise, was coupled with a provision empowering the legislature to tax corporations owning or using franchises or privileges by general law uniform as to the class on which it operates. Under such a constitution taxes imposed in that state upon domestic railroads according to a general system for valuing, first, the real estate and localized chattels, in the several localities where the line runs by the local assessors and taxing these like other local property; second, the railroad track and appurtenances, right of way, and structures thereon with rolling stock and other movables by a state board and the local apportionment according to mileage; and third, the invisible and intangible property, called franchise and capital stock by the same board with a like apportionment, the value of the third class being found by taking the market value of the share stock and funded debt and deducting the assessed value of the other two classes,—are held to be fair and equitable, repugnant neither to such constitutional provisions, nor to any provision of the United States Constitution. State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, sub nom. Taylor v. Secor, 23 L. ed. 663.

A statute empowering a state board of equalization to fix the fair cash value of corporate capital stock and franchisees of all domestic corporations above the assessed value of their tangible property satisfies all the requirements of such a constitutional provision. Such a statute is a general one and uniform as to the class on which it operates. It is not essential that franchisees be valued and taxed separately, nor that the precise amount that the corporation shall pay be stated and be the same for every corporation regardless of the value of its franchises or privileges. Nor is it requisite that taxation of this character be like that imposed upon occupations. Neither is it needful that the same set of assessors be charged to assess both tangible and intangible property, nor that they do so upon the same basis. Porter v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. 76 Ill. 561.

Other cases of like decisions are: Republic L. Ins. Co. v. Pollak, 75 Ill. 292; Ottawa Glass Co. v. McCaleb, 81 Ill. 556; Pacific Hotel Co. v. Lieb, 83 Ill. 602.

And an assessment upon a railroad, made by taking the value of all its possessions, tangible and intangible, including franchisees, and deducting the assessed value of the tangibles, is not violative of the rule of equality and uniformity by the mere fact that such a method of assessment, when applied to many other corporations, comes out a negative value. The object of deducting the assessed value of the tangibles is to avoid double taxation, and it may well happen that these constitute all the property of value that the corporation owns; or that it has been overvalued to an extent equaling the worth of the franchise and intangibles together; or, upon the other hand, that the tangibles have been undervalued, or to some extent escaped assessment; or that the franchise and intangibles really have additional value,—so that in one case there is more property to value, or else it has already been included in assessing the tangibles and in the other, property not assessed, or insufficiently assessed, is reached and subjected to taxation. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Siders, 88 Ill. 320; Huck v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 86 Ill. 352.

Inasmuch as a foreign insurance company can only do business in a state where it did not originate by that comity that exists between states, and must submit to such terms as may be imposed upon it or cease to do business within it, nothing in such constitutional provision prevents the legislature from imposing terms upon foreign insurance or other corporations as conditions upon which they may do business, which are not put upon domestic organizations of the same character. Hughes v. Cairo, 92 Ill. 339.

That provision of the Constitution is not infringed by a revenue act for the valuation for taxation by a state board of equalization of the capital stock, including the franchise of domestic corporations in general, at the fair cash value above the assessed value of the tangible property, but excepting from its operation manufacturing, stock breeding, and newspaper corporations, and expressly leaving these to be assessed on their property like individuals by local assessors. Coal Run Coal Co. v. Finlen, 124 Ill. 666, 17 N. E. 11.

While it is true that both capital stock and franchises are property, and as such taxable to a corporation, this does not render such revenue act unconstitutional under such a provision. Sterling Gas Co. v. Higby, 134 Ill. 557, 25 N. E. 660.

Under the Nebraska constitutional provision couched in very much the same language, except that it provides that the legislature shall have power to tax certain specified classes of persons and occupations (among which, however, litigants are not named) in such manner as it shall direct by general law uniform as to the class upon which it operates, a statute exacting from every party commencing suit in the supreme court a $10 tax to be paid the clerk and turned over to the county treasurer is not void, as constitutions are limitations on the legislative taxing power, not grants of authority, and therefore, when the taxing power is not restricted by express language, it continues unlimited. State ex rel. Atchinson & N. R. Co. v. Lancaster County, 4 Neb. 537, 19 Am. Rep. 641.

Such a constitutional provision does not allow individual or corporate debts to be deducted from the true value of property or franchises in determining the value thereof for taxation, and if the manner of ascertaining such value when strictly followed will result in so doing, and will not result in levying a tax by valuation so that every taxpayer shall pay in proportion to the value of the property and franchises owned, the manner prescribed violates the Constitution, and is, in so far, invalid. Therefore, a law which requires the assessor to deduct corporate indebtedness from the actual value of the shares of stock in fixing what shall be assessed as capital stock is 57 L. R. A.

void. State ex rel. Shriver v. Karr (Neb.) 90 N. W. 298.

A constitutional provision requiring all property to be taxed in proportion to its value, whether owned by natural or artificial persons, unless exempt by the Constitution, and all property of corporations to pay the same rate of taxation paid by that of individuals, with a further provision authorizing the legislature to tax incomes, licenses, and franchisees, is not violated by a law for the taxation of corporate franchisees, naming as subject thereunto twenty different kinds, beginning with railroads and closing with a clause generally inclusive of every other like corporation, company, or association, also every other corporation, company, or association having or exercising any special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons or performing any public service; for it makes no discrimination among corporations. Paducah Street R. Co. v. McCracken County, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1294, 49 S. W. 178.

Such a constitutional provision is not violated by a law subjecting to taxation intangible corporate property which from its very nature is not susceptible of individual ownership. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Norman, 77 Fed. 13.

The constitutionality of the Kentucky statute (§§ 4077-4081), passed upon in the two cases just cited, was again challenged so recently as June, 1902, but the court declared that its constitutionality had been repeatedly affirmed. It was, they said, before the court in Henderson Bridge Co. v. Com. 99 Ky. 623, 29 L. R. A. 73, 31 S. W. 486, in May, 1895, and affirmed in 166 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 953, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 532. That it was also sustained in Paducah Street R. Co. v. McCracken, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1294, 49 S. W. 178; South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Bellevue, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1184, 49 S. W. 23; Louisville R. Co. v. Com. 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1509, 49 S. W. 486; Louisville & J. Ferry Co. v. Com. 22 Ky. L. Rep. 446, 57 S. W. 624; and Henderson Bridge Co. v. Negley, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 746, 63 S. W. 989. "We therefore conclude," it was added, "that the validity of the franchise statute has been conclusively settled, and it is therefore unnecessary to enter into a discussion of that question." Southern R. Co. v. Coulter, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 203, 68 S. W. 873.

States may impose upon foreign corporations any terms or burdens as conditions of entering their territory irrespective of their treatment of like domestic corporations and regardless of provisions in the state Constitution requiring uniformity and equality of taxation upon property, and of the clause in the United States Constitution respecting the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens in the several states. Com. v. Milton, 12 B. Mon. 212, 54 Am. Dec. 522.

Although it is settled law that, so far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, states may impose upon foreign corporations seeking to enter and do business within them such terms as they see fit as conditions upon which their permission so to do is given irrespective of the commerce clause and guaranty of the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states to all alike, it is nevertheless true that the provisions of the state Constitution are equally effective to protect foreign as well as domestic corporations from unconstitutional taxation. Hence, when a state tax is levied upon the gross receipts of foreign insurance companies, and not levied upon those of any other class, inasmuch as that is an income tax, and not a tax on capital or capital stock, it violates a constitutional provision requiring all property to be taxed in proportion to its value. Parker v. North British & M. Ins. Co. 42 La. Ann. 428, 7 So. 599.

Let the reader contrast this decision and the reasoning that leads to it with cases in other jurisdictions, of which Hughes v. Calro, 92 Ill. 339, above cited, is typical.

The requirement of the Massachusetts Constitution that assessments, rates, and taxes imposed and levied upon the inhabitants and residents of, and estates lying within, the commonwealth shall be proportional applies to property taxes, assessments, and rates only, and not at all to franchise and privilege taxes and licenses. These need not be proportional. Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 632, 18 L. ed. 904.

A statute laying a percentage tax upon the paid-in capital of dividend paying banks is a duty or excise upon the banking privilege or franchise, and that is a commodity. Such a tax need not be proportional, as it is not within that requirement of the Constitution, but falls under another part of that instrument,—the part authorizing the imposition and levy of reasonable duties and excises upon any commodities brought into, produced, or made within the commonwealth. Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. 262.

The provision in the Mississippi Constitution that the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit shall be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals, and that taxation shall be equal and uniform and all property be taxed in proportion to its value, is not violated by a state revenue act laying a privilege tax upon banks according to their capital stock and assets in lieu of all other taxes, state, county, and municipal thereon, and on the shares of their stock. Vicksburg Bank v. Worrell, 67 Miss. 47, 7 So. 219.

A section of a state constitution providing that property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules according to its true value, when that instrument contains no other restriction upon the power of taxation, does not in anywise inhibit the legislature from imposing license or franchise taxes, or render such taxes invalid for want of equality. Standard Underground Cable Co. v. Atty. Gen. 46 N. J. Eq. 270, 19 Atl. 733.

A statute for the taxation of railroad and canal properties under a special system constituted for the purpose is not in conflict with such a constitution, because, in ascertaining the value of corporate property for taxation thereunder, the franchise of its owner is to be taken into account as an element in that value. State Bd. of Assessors v. Central R. Co. 48 N. J. L. 146, 4 Atl. 578, per Parker, J.

When a new species or class of taxable property is created by an act of the legislature, as, for instance the special franchise of a gas company to lay down its mains in city streets, a constitutional provision requiring all city, town, and village officers to be elected by the electors or appointed by the local authorities where they serve does not restrain the legislature from committing the valuation and assessment thereof to a state board of tax commissioners instead of the local assessors, even when in the same statute it chooses to classify the subject of the tax as land for the purposes of taxation. Buffalo Gas Co. v. Volz, 31 Misc. 160, 64 N. Y. Supp. 534; New York, L. & W. R. Co. v. Roll, 32 Misc. 321, 66 N. Y. Supp. 748.

When a state constitution, however, requires all the real and personal property in the state to be taxed uniformly according to its true value, and requires township trustees to assess the taxable property in their respective townships; and the legislature enacts general laws to give practical effect to these requirements; and the organic law elsewhere empowers without directing the legislature to tax franchises, and without prescribing any method of so doing,—the legislature cannot constitutionally take from township trustees their power to assess and tax the roadbed and superstructure of a railroad within their jurisdiction; but it is at liberty to provide for the assessment and taxation of the railroad franchise in any way it may deem advisable. Wilmington, C. & A. R. Co. v. Brunswick County, 72 N. C. 10; Richmond & D. R. Co. N. C. Div. v. Brogden, 74 N. C. 707; Wilmington R. Bridge Co. v. New Hanover County, 72 N. C. 15.

Such a constitution is violated by a state revenue act providing for the taxation of three classes of railroads, viz.: (1) Those whose property or shares are exempt by their charters, upon their gross receipts at one rate; (2) those in like manner exempt upon their real estate held for right of way, stations, and workshops, but taxable on their franchises and personal property, also upon their gross receipts but at another rate; and (3) those exempt on their property, and not within the other two classes, upon their mileage by an annual privilege tax; and the act is consequently void. Worth v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 89 N. C. 291; Worth v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 89 N. C. 301.

A constitutional provision vesting in the general assembly the legislative power of the state is a grant of the general power of taxation, since the power to raise revenue for public purposes is a legislative power. It follows, therefore, that a subsequent provision in that instrument, that taxation shall be by a uniform rule on all kinds of property according to its true value in money is a limitation upon the legislative power to tax property, and does not circumscribe all revenue measures, but leaves untrammelled the power of the legislature to impose taxes for revenue or regulation upon any business, pursuit, or vocation, or upon the privilege accorded to a foreign corporation to do business as such within the state. A state law to that end therefore is valid. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Mayer, 28 Ohio St. 521.

And such a constitution, notwithstanding it also provides that the property of corporations shall be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals, is not violated by a statute laying a percentage tax upon the capital stock subscribed for or issued and outstanding of corporations, although the property in which such capital stock is invested is also taxed as property ad valorem, because such a law imposes an excise tax, not a tax upon property. Southern Gum Co. v. Laylen (Ohio) 64 N. E. 564.

While the Ohio Constitution contains no express limitation upon the power of the legislature to tax privileges and franchises, there is an implied limitation thereon in the provisions requiring private property ever to be held inviolate but subservient to the public welfare, and declaring government instituted for the equal protection and benefit of the people and the Constitution established to promote the common welfare, so that a tax on privileges and franchises cannot exceed the reasonable value of the privilege or franchise originally conferred or its continued annual value thereafter. And while the determination of such value rests largely with the general assembly, it does so finally with the courts. Ibid.

A state tax of 1-10 of 1 per cent upon the amount of capital stock subscribed or issued and outstanding, imposed upon corporations as a franchise or privilege tax, is not unreasonable,—not above the continuing value of the franchise from year to year, and therefore is clearly within the legislative power. Ibid.

A provision in a constitution declaring that the state may continue to collect all specific taxes accruing to the treasury under existing laws, and that the legislature may provide for the collection of specific taxes from banking, railroad, plankroad, and other corporations thereafter created, does not limit the power of the legislature to tax anything and everything within the state, including a business not mentioned in the laws existent when such constitution was adopted, nor afterwards incorporated, but rather it expressly confers power to tax when but for such provision it might by exemption clauses in corporate charters be considered as forever lost by surrender. Walcott v. People, 17 Mich. 68.

Under a constitution requiring all taxes to be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority imposing the tax and to be levied and collected under general laws, but giving the legislature power to exempt public property in public use, places of worship, public cemeteries, and charitable institutions, it is competent for that body to impose a franchise tax upon coal mining or dealing corporations, both foreign and domestic, at the same ton rate on their mined or purchased stock not consumed by themselves. Kittanning Coal Co. v. Com. 79 Pa. 100.

Such a constitutional provision not only requires laws in conformity to its mandate, but that the assessment of the taxes imposed by unobjectionable laws bring about equality and uniformity. Com. v. Mammoth Vein Coal & I. Co. 3 Dauph. Co. Rep. 220.

One state cannot constitutionally tax the entire capital stock, nor impose a tax measured by the entire gross receipts, of a consolidated railroad operating in several states a line extending from one to another through intervening ones, and made up of constituent corporations organized under and authorized to consolidate by laws of each of such states respectively. The power of any one state to tax such a corporation upon its capital stock or receipts is limited to such a part thereof as is employed or gained within its limits. There is a double reason for this, in that a state can only tax that which is within its jurisdiction, and only objects in the same class equally and uniformly and property proportionately. State Treasurer v. Auditor General, 46 Mich. 224, 9 N. W. 258.

When a state constitution provides that domestic insurance companies shall not be required to pay a greater tax in the aggregate than is required to be paid by foreign insurance companies, except to the extent of the excess of their ad valorem tax over the privilege tax imposed upon such foreign corporations, a domestic insurance company that has been compelled by law to pay a privilege or franchise tax, and which is not possessed of assets taxable ad valorem to an amount sufficient to yield a larger sum than the privilege tax paid, which privilege tax equals that required of foreign insurance companies doing business in the state, is not subject to any further tax, state, county, or municipal, since the legislature having the power to confer exemptions impliedly gave immunity by imposing such privilege tax; otherwise the constitutional guaranty would be violated. Brennan v. Mississippi Home Ins. Co. 70 Miss. 531, 13 So. 228.

declared to be as broad and plenary as is the taxing power, so that whatever in the state is subject to the latter is within the regulating restrictions of the former. Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 346, 2 Intern. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6.

It has been seen that privilege or franchise taxes are not covered by constitutional provisions respecting the equal and uniform taxation of property ad valorem, and that most of such provisions are coupled with express consents to the taxation of franchises, privileges, occupations, and callings as the legislature may direct by general laws operating uniformly on members of the same class; and it has been remarked that the legislative power to classify was subject to little, if any, restraint.

The following cases upon this point are illuminating:

The right to acquire and keep property cannot constitutionally be forbidden by the state. The function of the legislature in this respect is limited to regulating the use of property in the interest of the general welfare, the public health, or morals. So that while, for instance, the state may tax the occupation of keeping a billiard table for the use of others for hire, and may regulate, perhaps, the method of using it, it cannot make the acquisition and keeping of such a piece of property a privilege, and forbid anyone so to do except upon payment of a license or privilege tax. Stevens v. State, 2 Ark. 291, 35 Am. Dec. 72.

A constitutional provision that nothing in that instrument shall be construed to prevent the general assembly from providing taxation based on income, licenses, or franchises, leaves the legislature competent to declare what corporations or companies have taxable franchises. Providence Banking Co. v. Webster County, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 214, 57 S. W. 14.

Under the Nebraska Constitution the legislature may determine what purposes are of public concern, so as to render them subject to taxation. State ex rel. Custer County Agri. Soc. & L. S. Exchange v. Johnson, 35 Neb. 401, 17 L. R. A. 333, 53 N. W. 213.

Under a constitution giving the legislature power to tax merchants, peddlers, and privileges in such manner as it may from time to time direct, a privilege is whatever the legislature chooses to declare such and so tax. Kurth v. State, 86 Tenn. 134, 5 S. W. 593.

Although this proposition was positively asserted in that case, it is rather a dictum than a decision. The tax there sub judice was one upon the privilege of liquor selling. This is universally admitted to be the subject of license regulation.

In a later case the same court, speaking of this provision in the Tennessee Constitution, declared that in construing it to mean that a privilege was whatever the legislature chose so to declare it meant thereby "that whatever occupation affects the public may be so classed and taxed as such." Nashville, M. & S. Turnp. Co. v. White, 92 Tenn. 369, 22 S. W. 75.

Sometimes the state Constitution denies power to the legislature to impose taxes upon counties, cities, town or other public corporations, or upon the inhabitants or property thereof for local purposes, requiring the legislature to vest this authority by general laws in the local officials. When such is the case a state statute taxing foreign insurance companies a percentage of their yearly premiums for a local purpose is void irrespective of whether or not such company can be regarded as an inhabitant of the local district, and whether or not the tax can be regarded as one upon property, since the purpose of such a constitutional provision is to relegate to the local authorities the whole subject of taxation for local purposes, and it will be construed as effecting such purpose. San Francisco v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. 74 Cal. 113, 15 Pac. 380.

But such a provision does not invalidate a statute classifying persons, associations, and corporations engaged in banking, loaning money at interest, and dealing in securities, coin, and bullion, and requiring them to pay a license charge of a stated amount, and providing that all revenue from such sources shall be retained by and for the use of the county in which it is collected. State v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. (Idaho) 67 Pac. 647.

Nor is such a provision violated by a statute for the taxation of corporate franchises, providing for a valuation thereof by a state board and the payment upon such valuation of a state tax, and in the locality where a corporation subject thereto is of such local taxes as the local authorities assess upon such valuation in common with other property of the same value in such places. Paducah Street R. Co. v. McCracken, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1294, 49 S. W. 178.

Such a provision is violated by a statute requiring insurance companies to pay a part of their gross receipts to local fire companies. State v. Wheeler, 33 Neb. 563, 50 N. W. 770.

But generally it is in the power of the state to require local improvements to be made which are essential to the health and prosperity of any community within its borders. To this end it may provide for constructing canals to drain marshy and malarious districts, levees to prevent inundations, and for the opening of streets in cities and roads in the country. And whenever a local improvement is ordered or authorized it is for the legislature to prescribe the way in which the means to meet its cost shall be obtained, whether by general taxation or by laying the burden upon the district specially benefited by the expenditure, and its selection of method is purely discretionary. Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 701, 28 L. ed. 569, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663.

A constitutional provision that any law which imposes, continues, or revives a tax shall distinctly state the tax and the purpose to which it is to be applied, and that it shall not be sufficient to refer to any other law to fix such tax or object, has no application to a tax imposed as a condition upon foreign insurance companies for the privilege of doing business in the state,—a tax in the nature of a license fee; but it relates solely to a general tax coextensive with the state. Hence a retaliatory statute is not invalid upon that ground. People v. Fire Asso. of Philadelphia, 92 N. Y. 312, 44 Am. Rep. 380.

Such a provision does not affect the validity of a statute exacting annually from agents of foreign insurance companies taking fire risks in a given city a specified percentage of the gross premiums from such risks, and directing the payment thereof to an incorporated association of former firemen for benevolences to its members, as the required payment is of the same nature. Exempt Firemen's Benev. Fund v. Roome, 93 N. Y. 313, 45 Am. Rep. 217.

Such a provision is sufficiently conformed to in a statute imposing specific taxes upon corporations when such taxes are stated to be applicable to the payment of the ordinary and current expenses of the state. People v. Home Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 328; People v. Horn Silver Min. Co. 105 N. Y. 76, 11 N. E. 155.

A constitutional provision prohibiting the legislature from passing any special law for the assessment or collection of taxes is not violated by the enactment of a statute which classifies railroads running in more than one county for taxation upon their franchises, right of way, rails, roadbed, and rolling stock, since such property is of a kind that the general methods of taxing tangible property with a fixed situs cannot be applied. People v. Central P. R. Co. 105 Cal. 576, 38 Pac. 905.

A statute that invests a corporation with the identical franchises, rights, privileges, and immunities formerly possessed by another corporation of the same kind, including the right to be a corporation and a partial exemption from taxation, which the state held in commission in the right of its general sovereignty by virtue of a decree of foreclosure, is not void as an attempt to form a corporation by special act, inhibited by the Constitution. First Div. of St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Parcher, 14 Minn. 297, 6 Ill. 224.

A constitutional limitation as to the rate of taxation upon taxable property within the state does not apply to a tax upon the gross income of a corporation. Capital City Water Co. v. Montgomery County Bd. of Revenue, 117 Ala. 303, 23 So. 970.

The provision in the California Constitution (art. 13, § 10) that the franchises, roadway, roadbed, rails and rolling stock of all railroads operated in more than one county shall be assessed at their actual value by the state board of equalization, and shall be apportioned to the counties, cities, etc., in which such railroads are located according to mileage, is self-executing, requiring no further legislation. San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization, 60 Cal. 12.

b. Double taxation.

The few cases in which franchise taxes have been complained of as amounting to double taxation of the subjects thereof have been grouped here because it seemed convenient to refer to them under this head. It cannot be said that there is any limitation, short of an express restriction of some kind in a written constitution, to impose double taxation if a state chooses so to do. And, generally speaking, all states do so, more or less, so far as corporations are concerned.

In corporations four elements of taxable value are sometimes found: (1) Franchises; (2) capital stock in the hands of the corporation; (3) corporate property; and (4) shares of the capital stock in the hands of the individual stockholders. Each of these is, under some circumstances, an appropriate subject of taxation, and it is no doubt within the power of the state, when not restrained by constitutional limitations, to assess taxes upon them in a way to subject the corporation or the stockholders to double taxation. Double taxation is, however, never to be presumed. Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 129, 29 L. ed. 830, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645, Waite, Ch. J.

As Herrick, J., of the New York supreme court, well expressed it in sustaining a statute of that state imposing an excise tax upon the gross earnings of railroads, against the objection that, in so far as this included corporate income from stocks and bonds in other corporations subject to like taxes, it was invalid for doubly taxing: The rule against double taxation is a rule of legislation, not of law. It is a question of expediency, not of power. And while a court will not infer an intention to impose a double tax, but rather will construe a statute otherwise where that can be done without forcing, still the power of the legislature is undoubted. People, New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Roberts, 32 App. Div. 113, 52 N. Y. Supp. 859.

A tax on the franchise or the property of a corporation is not in law or in fact equivalent to a tax on the shares of stock in the hands of the stockholders. Owensboro Nat. Bank v. Owensboro, 173 U. S. 664, 43 L. ed. 850, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 537.

It is not double taxation to impose an excise tax upon a corporation equal to a percentage upon its subscribed-for or issued and outstanding capital stock, and at the same time tax ad valorem the property in which such capital stock is invested. Southern Gum Co. v. Laylin (Ohio) 64 N. E. 564.

A franchise tax upon the gross receipts of a domestic corporation cannot be considered duplicate taxation because the subject of it has previously paid a tax levied upon its shares of stock. The one tax is upon the property of the stockholders alone; the other is upon the corporation for its franchise. United States Electric Power & Light Co. v. State, 79 Md. 63, 28 Atl. 768.

The payment by a corporation of a franchise tax imposed according to the amount of its capital stock does not relieve its lessee from the payment of a privilege or occupation tax on the business it was incorporated to carry on. The first is a tax on the right or privilege of being a corporation and for the right to do business as such; the second is a tax for the privilege of carrying on the particular business, calling, or occupation engaged in. Cobb v. Durham County, 122 N. C. 307, 30 S. E. 338.

The payment of a state tax upon the value of its corporate franchise by a private corporation does not per se discharge it from ordinary taxes upon its lands. Carbon Iron Co. v. Carbon County, 30 Pa. 251.

A statute requiring all corporations, both foreign and domestic, not otherwise specifically required to pay a license tax, to pay annually certain privilege or franchise taxes therein set forth, imposes excises upon all corporations as a class without reference to the particular business they are engaged in and as prerequisites to the doing of any business at all in a corporate capacity. It does not lay imposts upon any particular business. Hence, the payment by a fertilizer company thereunto subject, of a license fee for selling or exchanging fertilizers exacted under another statute, and of the legal charge for official tags to be attached to each package of fertilizer sold, does not exonerate it from the payment of such privilege or franchise taxes. Troy Fertilizer Co. v. State (Ala.) 32 So. 618.

On the other hand, it is held in Texas that a separate assessment upon a corporate franchise after the assessed corporation has paid taxes upon all its real and personal property at the full value thereof is void because it is double taxation. State v. Austin & N. W. R. Co. 94 Tex. 530, 62 S. W. 1050; Southwestern Tele. & Teleph. Co. v. Meerscheidt (Tex. Civ. App.) 65 S. W. 381.

IX. Valuation of franchises for the purposes of taxation.

No general rule that obtains in all the states, or indeed in any considerable number of them, for the valuation of corporate franchises, can be formulated. The standard of measurement and the methods of applying it change almost as often as a state line is crossed. "The state may impose taxes upon the corporation as an entity existing under its laws, as well as upon the capital stock of the corporation or its separate corporate property. And the manner in which its value shall be assessed, . . . however arbitrary or capricious, are mere matters of legislative discretion." Delaware Railroad Tax, 18 Wall. 206, sub nom. Minot v. 57 L. R. A.

The commentator is therefore obliged to group the cases in point, chiefly geographical-ly.

In California it is correct to take the aggregate market value of the shares of stock and deduct therefrom the value of the real and personal property, and treat the difference as representing the value of the franchise. Spring Valley Water Works v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 89.

In Massachusetts it is declared that, inasmuch as the market value of the shares is generally a sure indication of the value of all that appertains to or belongs to the corporation, corporeal and incorporeal, the aggregate market value of all the shares or stock affords a reasonable and equitable mode of measuring the value of the franchise. Com. v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. 12 Allen, 298, Bigelow, Ch. J.

When this case reached the Supreme Court it was said that actual market value of the capital stock of a corporation is determined by factors differing essentially in kind from those which fix the actual value of the property and assets of the corporation which its capital stock represents; hence, a tax measured by the cash market value of the corporate stock is a franchise, and not a property, tax. Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 73 U. S. 632, 18 L. ed. 904.

And when the assessors, in valuing the corporate stock for the purpose of imposing a franchise tax thereon, follow the correct method of taking the aggregate market value of the shares and deducting therefrom the assessed value of the real estate and machinery subjected to local taxes, the courts cannot interfere with the valuation arrived at on the ground that such market value, although real and actual, is speculative and greatly exceeds the value of all the property owned by the corporation. Com. v. Cary Improv. Co. 98 Mass. 19, following and declared to stand upon the same ground as the last cited case.

And as a state rightfully may deny to foreign corporations permission to transact their business, hold property, or exercise any corporate function whatever within its limits, or may permit them to exercise such privilege upon such terms as it sees fit to prescribe, it may impose a franchise or privilege tax—i. e., an excise or duty upon a commodity—upon a foreign corporation having an office or place of business within it, of a percentage on the par value of its entire capital stock, whether employed in or out of the state, and whether owned by residents or nonresidents. Atty. Gen. v. Bay State Min. Co. 99 Mass. 148, 96 Am. Dec. 717.

In that state the amount of a franchise tax or excise upon a savings bank under a statute making it a percentage payable semi-annually upon the average amount of deposits during the preceding six months is based only upon the sums due depositors for their deposits, with accrued interest and declared dividends thereon. A guaranty fund held by the bank and undivided profits are not included in the term "deposits." Re Suffolk Sav. Bank, 151 Mass. 103, 23 N. E. 728.

In Nebraska when the capital stock of a corporation has any market value, that value may be taken as the basis to ascertain the value of the intangible corporate property, since the value of the stock is the net value of the assets and is found by deducting indebtedness from the gross value of all the corporate property, tangible and intangible; but when the capital stock has no market value it cannot be used as a basis of determining the assessable value of the corporate property and franchises. In that case, under a constitution requiring in terms the assessment of corporate franchises, the actual value of capital stock in a corporation under a statute for the taxation thereof is found by adding the value of the franchises to the value of its tangible property and deducting the value of the real and personal property assessed in specie. State ex rel. Shriver v. Karr (Neb.) 90 N. W. 298.

In New York it is said that the legislature in laying a tax upon the business done by a foreign corporation within the state is constitutionally competent to make it specific, and is not bound to base it upon an apportionment or appraisal, and that such an imposition, though arbitrary, is not harmful when measured by the ability of the subject to pay; that a foreign corporation thus subjected to a specific franchise tax upon its business within the state cannot complain that the method of computation provided by the act is not according to the amount of business done or capital stock employed within the state, nor, when measured by dividends declared, according to the proportion of such dividends earned within the state. People v. Equitable Trust Co. 96 N. Y. 387.

When the statute taxes domestic corporations on their franchises on the basis of the amount of capital employed within the state, the tax to be upon the capital stock at par in the case of a corporation paying 6 per cent or more dividends at a stated rate for each 1 per cent of dividends made or declared, and in the case of a corporation paying less than 6 per cent dividends or none at all at a different rate upon the actual value of the capital stock according to a sworn report of the corporate officers, but appraised at not less than the average price at which the shares sold during the year,—the basis of the tax upon a domestic corporation which has paid no dividends and of whose stock none has been sold during the year is the actual value of its gross assets less its debts and liabilities and plus the value of its goodwill and the right to conduct its business under its franchise. People ex rel. Wiebusch & H. Co. v. Roberts, 154 N. Y. 101, 47 N. E. 980, Affirming 19 App. Div. 574, 46 N. Y. Supp. 570.

In this case goodwill was declared an element of taxable value in a corporate franchise. It was again so declared, but held not the subject of local taxation, in People ex rel. Cornell S. B. Co. v. Dederick, 161 N. Y. 195, 55 N. E. 927, and was one of the taxable elements in People ex rel. A. J. Johnson Co. v. Roberts, 159 N. Y. 70, 45 L. R. A. 126, 53 N. E. 685.

The learned court in California that decided that, in ascertaining the value of a corporate franchise, goodwill did not enter into, nor form any element of value, and in so holding, said: "No case has been produced to us, nor have we been able to find any, holding, or even intimating, that this is so. We find no such element of value in the least hinted at by anyone who has written on the subject, nor has any such been called to our attention. We cannot recognize any such element as giving value to shares in a trading corporation. It would be strange to predicate goodwill as pertaining to or extending to an abstraction, to an artificial being, invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law" (Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69),—would not now thus express itself. The case of Hart v. Smith (Ind.) 64 N. E. 661, in which the holding was that, granting goodwill to be property, yet it is not taxable unless the legislature so orders, notwithstanding the state Constitution provides that the general assembly shall 57 L. R. A.

enact laws for the taxation of all property, both real and personal, except certain classes not inclusive that may be expressly exempted, as such a clause is not self-executing, is not necessarily in conflict. Because that case involved the attempt to tax the goodwill of individual partners engaged in publishing a newspaper, and, there being no law, organic or statutory, in Indiana for the taxation of individual enterprises as entreties in going concerns, but, on the contrary, only provisions for taxation of personal property by segregation and itemization (goodwill not being in the schedule), a general assessment inclusive of goodwill where it was impossible to separate this factor from the others was thereby rendered void in toto. The case plainly intimates that it is otherwise of taxation of corporations where express provision is made for their taxation by the entirety, and that in such cases goodwill may be an element in the valuation.

In assessing such franchise tax upon a domestic corporation that has paid dividends amounting to at least 6 per cent the tax is based by the terms of the statute upon the par value of the stock; and hence it is not material in that case what the amount of assets is, nor are the corporate debts to be deducted. People ex rel. Jewelers' Circular Pub. Co. v. Roberts, 155 N. Y. 1, 49 N. E. 248.

Surplus cannot be included as part of the capital stock employed within the state as a basis of valuation for the purposes of such franchise tax. People ex rel. United Verde Copper Co. v. Roberts, 156 N. Y. 585, 51 N. E. 293, Reversing 25 App. Div. 89, 48 N. Y. Supp. 881.

When such statute requires the franchise tax upon domestic corporations to be computed on the basis of the capital stock employed within the state at the rate of one quarter of a mill for each 1 per cent of dividends made or declared during the year if these were 6 per cent or more on the par value of the capital stock; and if they were less than 6 per cent on such par value the tax to be at the rate of one and one half mills upon such portion of the capital stock at par as the amount thereof employed within the state bears to the entire capital stock; and if there have been no dividends, then the tax to be at the same rate upon each dollar of the appraised value of the capital stock employed within the state; and there being a further provision in such statute of a rule for valuing the capital stock of corporations which have paid none at all or less than 6 per cent of dividends according to the average selling price of the shares,—a domestic corporation which is employing its entire capital stock within the state, and which has paid a dividend of only 4 per cent, is taxable upon the appraised or actual and real value of its capital stock, and not upon the par or nominal value thereof. People ex rel. New York & E. River Ferry Co. v. Roberts, 168 N. Y. 14, 40 N. E. 1043, Reversing 35 App. Div. 625, 53 N. Y. Supp. 1146.

The rule laid down in this case requires that the computation of the franchise tax upon a domestic corporation that has paid or declared dividends less than 6 per cent be upon the basis of the actual, and not the par, value of the capital stock when that is at a premium. People ex rel. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Knight, 77 N. Y. Supp. 401.

A tax upon the corporate franchise of a domestic corporation according to the amount of its capital stock employed within the state is not to be lessened by the amount thereof that may be invested in real estate subject to local taxation. People ex rel. Postal Teleg. Cable

Co. v. Campbell, 70 Hun, 507, 24 N. Y. Supp. 208.

In the taxation of a domestic corporation on its franchise based upon capital stock employed in the home state, real estate situated in another state, and United States bonds deposited in a third state and in Canada to enable the corporation to carry on its business in such foreign jurisdictions, are not to be included. People ex rel. American Surety Co. v. Campbell, 74 Hun, 101, 26 N. Y. Supp. 462, affirming on majority opinion below, 143 N. Y. 625, 87 N. E. 827.

Freight cars owned by a domestic railroad corporation and permanently engaged without the state, and stock which it owns in a foreign corporation, are also to be excluded, because these form no part of the capital employed within the home state which is the basis of such franchise tax. But it is otherwise in respect of bonds or other obligations of foreign corporations, for these have their situs at the domicile of the owner; hence capital stock invested therein is employed at the home office. People v. Campbell, 88 Hun, 544, 34 N. Y. Supp. 801.

Under such statute the comptroller is at liberty to appraise the capital stock according to the average selling price, although the real value thereof is reported by the corporation to be much less. People ex rel. Brooklyn Elev. R. Co. v. Roberts, 90 Hun, 537, 36 N. Y. Supp. 84.

Nor is he limited to the par value of the stock, but he has a right to, and should, assess it at the average selling price, although that was at premium. People ex rel. Colonial Trust Co. v. Morgan, 47 App. Div. 126, 62 N. Y. Supp. 191, affirmed on opinion below in 162 N. Y. 654, 57 N. E. 1116.

It is the average capital employed within the state during the year that is to be taken as the basis of such franchise tax, not the highest sum employed at any given time. People ex rel. Brooklyn Rapid Transit Co. v. Morgan, 57 App. Div. 335, 68 N. Y. Supp. 21.

When it appears from the controller's return to a certiorari that the only evidence before him upon which he grounded his valuation of the capital stock of a domestic railroad corporation at its full par value as the basis of a franchise tax imposed according to capital employed in his state consisted of a report from the corporation that showed the capital stock to be $500,000 in shares of $100 each, all paid in; and that the whole of it, with $4,500,000 more in income bonds made a lien prior to the stock, had been expended in construction and equipment, and that no dividends had ever been paid, while the stock had sold during the year neither higher nor lower than 10 per cent.,—his valuation is clearly erroneous and illegal. Such stock cannot be said to be worth more than the 10 per cent value put upon it by the company. Nor is the fact that the franchise is valuable, that the corporation has reduced its indebtedness, and that its prospective business is good, any warrant for valuing the stock at par. People ex rel. Staten Island Rapid Transit R. Co. v. Roberts, 4 App. Div. 334, 38 N. Y. Supp. 724.

The New York statute providing that the capital stock of corporations, together with the surplus profits or reserved funds thereof in excess of 10 per cent of the capital after deduction of the assessed value of their real estate and stock in other taxable corporations, should be assessed at its actual value and taxed in the same manner as other real and personal property in the county, under which corporations were subjected to local taxation, was long supposed to warrant assessments according to the actual market value of the share stock in the aggregate. The practice became general after the decision in Oswego Starch Factory v. Dolloway, 21 N. Y. 449, in which Denio, J., who delivered the opinion of the court, substantially declared that the value of corporate capital might be enhanced above par by crediting to it the money value of the fact that the enterprise was happily chosen and skillfully conducted, and intimated plainly that the value of the share stock is the fair equivalent of capital and surplus. It was known that such a method included the franchise as an element (People ex rel. Panama R. Co. v. New York Tax Comrs. 104 N. Y. 240, 10 N. E. 437), but the judicial pronouncements seemed to justify its inclusion in assessing local taxes.

It was, however, finally settled that this was erroneous, and that corporate franchises were not to be included in local assessments under that statute. People ex rel. Union Trust Co. v. Coleman, 126 N. Y. 433, 12 L. R. A. 762, 27 N. E. 818.

Since that decision it is uniformly held in New York that corporate franchises are not subject to local taxation under a law in such form. But to get the benefit of this rule a corporation must make clear to the assessors all the facts upon which the value of the franchise depends. People ex rel. Equitable Gaslight Co. v. Barker, 144 N. Y. 94, 39 N. E. 13, reversing 81 Hun, 22, 30 N. Y. Supp. 586; People ex rel. New York & Q. Gas & Electric Co. v. Feitner, 58 App. Div. 555, 69 N. Y. Supp. 27; People ex rel. Manhattan R. Co. v. Barker, 28 Misc. 18, 59 N. Y. Supp. 926.

When, however, a railroad is located wholly within the territory over which the local assessors have jurisdiction they have a right to assess its value when it has been leased to another road upon an agreed rental of a specified percentage of its cost plus repairs and taxes upon a capitalization of the rental less the assessed value of the real estate. The reason is that it cannot be assumed—at least in the absence of proof to that effect—that the franchise of such road was included in the lease, and that the rental is in part paid for the use thereof when the lessee had a franchise of its own, ample for the maintenance and operation of the leased road. People ex rel. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Feitner, 38 Misc. 204, 77 N. Y. Supp. 218.

Under that statute goodwill is no more locally taxable than is a franchise. People ex rel. Cornell S. B. Co. v. Dederick, 161 N. Y. 195, 55 N. E. 927.

In harmony with this decision, it was held in Indiana that a general act declaring all property in the state not expressly exempted subject to taxation, goodwill not being named as exempt, and that personal property should include certain things, not mentioning goodwill, did not render taxable the goodwill of a newspaper publishing business. Hart v. Smith (Ind.) 64 N. E. 661.

A foreign corporation whose property in New York consists of mains, pipes, and tanks for the reception and distribution of natural gas, laid or located in an incorporated village and made for taxable purposes by statutory definition real estate, and required as such to be assessed the same as real estate belonging to individuals and at its full value as it would be appraised in payment of a just debt due from a solvent debtor,—cannot be subjected to a local assessment when the assessors' rule of action is to value en bloc the property, rights, and privileges belonging to it, including the exclusive privilege of laying mains and the right to dig up and obstruct streets, considered in connection with the income from the entire plant and a comparison of its contract for supply, number of customers, share of receipts, and running expenses, since this includes the village franchise, which is not taxable. People ex rel. Keystone Gas Co. v. Martin, 48 Hun, 193.

A tax assessed by local assessors upon a railroad running through their jurisdiction in the state of New York, where the system of railroad taxation provides for the taxing of the franchisees under one statute and of the movables and personal property under another, and leaves to local assessors nothing assessable but real estate within their jurisdiction, is invalid, when the local assessors, in fixing upon the sum at which they assess the real property in their territory, considered such property, not as a separate piece standing alone, but as a part of an extensive and valuable railroad system, leased and occupied by the company, connecting distant and important terminals, and as a part of an extensive and valuable congeries of lines operated by the corporate owner, and based the assessment upon the cost, rentals, and earnings of the road as shown by its annual report to the state railroad commissioners; since it is obvious that both personal property and franchisees beyond their jurisdiction are important elements in cost, rentals, and earnings. People ex rel. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Clapp, 152 N. Y. 490, 39 L. R. A. 237, 46 N. E. 842.

In so far as the case of People ex rel. Buffalo & S. L. R. Co. v. Barker, 48 N. Y. 70, sanctions such a method, it cannot longer be considered an authority. Ibid.

Whatever may be the propriety of this rule in other states, where the assessing officers have jurisdiction over all the property of railroads in the state, and may deal with every element of value that enters into it or affects its earning capacity, it is not operative, and cannot be sanctioned, in New York. Ibid.

Under a system of railroad taxation similar to that adopted in New York, the rule of assessment is the same as that prevailing in that state, and when it is departed from the tax is void. Huntington v. Central P. R. Co. 2 Sawy. 503, Fed. Cas. No. 8,911.

In Louisiana another method of valuing corporate franchisees for taxation obtains. The law (La. Act 106 of 1890, §§ 28, 29) makes the earning capacity the standard of measurement. Corporations subject to the tax are required to furnish the assessors with a sworn statement of their earnings to form a basis for estimating the value of the franchisees. The assessors are entitled to capitalize the dividends paid at 6 per cent and assess the franchise according to the result. The corporation is not entitled to have the value of the franchise fixed at such a proportion of the sum paid for it as the length of time it has to run bears to the whole term for which it was granted. New Orleans City & L. R. Co. v. New Orleans Bd. of Assessors, 44 La. Ann. 1053, 1055, 11 So. 687, 820.

The assessors have a right to take the dividends actually paid as representative of earning capacity, although there would have been no dividends if profits instead of money borrowed for the purpose had been used for the betterments that were acquired. Crescent City R. Co. v. New Orleans, 44 La. Ann. 1057, 11 So. 681.

But dividends are not the sole measure of earning capacity. Ibid.; New Orleans City & L. R. Co. v. New Orleans, 44 La. Ann. 1053, 11 So. 687.

The gross receipts less current operating expenses are to be deemed earnings, not merely 57 L. R. A.

the aggregate dividends to stockholders, when it appears that these were diminished by annual payments from profits to reduce a bonded debt incurred to pay the purchase price of the franchise. State ex rel. St. Charles Street R. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 48 La. Ann. 1156, 20 So. 670.

But the assessors should consider other facts and circumstances which tend to augment or diminish the value of a franchise deductible from a capitalization of earnings. Crescent City R. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 51 La. Ann. 335, 25 So. 811.

When, for instance, it appears that a given railroad has actually paid its stockholders a dividend of 6 per cent upon its capital stock, the aggregate share stock may properly be regarded as the value of the franchise when the directly taxed property of the corporation has been deducted, although the actual earnings are only 8 per cent of the capital stock. St. Charles Street R. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 51 La. Ann. 459, 25 So. 90.

The Illinois system contemplates the assessment of corporate capital stock and corporate franchisees by a state commission under rules adopted by itself designed to determine actual values as the basis of its assessments.

When under that system the state board, in assessing a railroad for taxation according to the value of its capital stock and franchisees, adopts as the rule for determining that value the adding to the cash value of the aggregate shares of stock in the market the cash value in the market of the bonded debt, and deducting the assessed value of all the tangible property, no case is made for interference by the courts, since the market value of the share stock may fairly be considered as representing all the corporate property, including the franchise, when the corporation is free from debt, and that such market value is accordingly depressed by the amount of the debt; but when such assessing board also adds the debts of other railroads merely leased by the company assessed, by which neither it nor its property is at all liable, an injunction will be issued. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Cole, 75 Ill. 591.

In following a rule to ascertain for taxation the value of the capital stock of a corporation, including its franchisees, by taking the market value of its aggregate share stock and of its bonded debt together, less the assessed value of its tangible property, there is no assessing of the corporate debts, but only an arrival at what the capital stock and franchise would be worth if the corporation owed nothing,—its indebtedness being justly regarded as reducing the marketable value of its shares in proportion to the amount thereof. Porter v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. 76 Ill. 561.

Such a rule is just, legal, and constitutional. The debt is not taxed; it is only used as evidence to show the corporation possessed of property sufficient to pay its debts and afford a dividend besides to its shareholders equal to the market value of the shares. Ottawa Glass Co. v. McCaleb, 81 Ill. 557.

It is not a valid objection to an assessment upon the capital stock and franchise of a railroad corporation en bloc that it included shares of stock to the par value of $800,000, owned by the assessed company in another road and exempt from taxation, when the tangible property and capital stock is assessed with no showing of the value of such shares, or that they have any value, and also without showing that the tangible property or capital stock of the road that issued such shares has been assessed for taxes in the same year. Nor is the tax reducible pro tanto because such exempt shares were included in the assessment by the ignorance of the assessors, when the corporation subject to the tax knew of, and did not disclose, the exemption. Without knowledge there can be no fraud, and a mistake induced by the one against whom it is made affords no ground of relief. Huck v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 86 Ill. 332.

The fact that the state board of equalization, in valuing for taxation the capital stock and franchises of several railroads, makes in some cases such valuation no greater than the assessed value of the tangible property, and in others considerably greater, is not in itself evidence of unjust or fraudulent discrimination against the latter companies since the valuation may honestly and without intentional unfairness be returned one way or the other according as the circumstances vary. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Siders, 88 Ill. 322.

An objection that a railroad was not assessed for taxation on its capital stock and franchises at a rate uniform with other railroads, because it was a narrow-gauge road and worth 33 per cent less than standard gauge roads, is unsupported when it is not shown that the right of way, depot grounds, and buildings, capital stock, franchise, and earning power are also of less value. Union Trust Co. v. Weber, 96 Ill. 346.

A valid assessment, in Illinois, of the capital stock and franchise of a consolidated railroad formed of three constituents, one of which was a domestic corporation, whose road extends partly within Illinois and partly in other states, is made by taking the value of the entire capital stock of the consolidated company and adopting that amount thereof which should be to the value of the whole the same proportion as the length of the part of the line lying in Illinois bears to the entire length of the combined line owned and operated. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Weber, 96 Ill. 443.

A statutory system of general taxation of domestic railroads providing for the valuation: (1) Of the real estate not part of the right of way and the localized personal property in the several localities where they are situated by the local assessors in the same manner that other real and personal property are assessed and taxed; (2) of the railroad track, right of way, grading, superstructure, depots, buildings, and other improvements thereon, and all rolling stock and transitory personal property, by a state board of equalization with an apportionment to localities according to mileage; and (3) of the invisible and intangible railroad property called its franchise and capital stock by the same state board under such rules and principles as it may adopt to determine the fair cash value thereof above the tangibles, with a like apportionment to localities upon a mileage basis pursuant to which such state board values the capital stock and franchise by taking the market value of the share stock, adding thereto the market value of the funded debt, and deducting from the total the assessed values of the property in the first and second classes,—is a fair and equitable system, neither repugnant to any provision of the United States Constitution, nor to the uniformity and equality of taxation clause in the Constitution of Illinois. State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 611, sub nom. Taylor v. Secor, 23 L. ed. 663, 672.

"This court has expressly held in two cases where the road of a corporation ran through different states that a tax upon the income or franchise of the road was properly apportioned by taking the whole income or value of the franchise and the length of the road within each state as the basis of taxation. Delaware Railroad Tax, 18 Wall. 206, sub nom. Minot v. 57 L. R. A.

It has very recently been laid down by the highest court of Illinois that in assessing the capital stock of corporations, including the franchise, it is proper to add the market or fair cash value of the shares of stock and the market or fair cash value of the debt of the corporation exclusive of that owing for current expenses, and to take the aggregate amount so ascertained as the fair cash value of the capital stock, including the franchise, and deduct therefrom the equalized or assessed value of the tangible property of the corporation; and one fifth of the remainder, under the Illinois laws, will be the net assessed valuation of the capital stock and franchise over and above the assessment of tangible property. State Bd. of Equalization v. People ex rel. Goggin, 191 Ill. 528, 61 N. E. 339.

In the same case it was further held that where the statute directed the state board of equalization to adopt rules and principles for ascertaining the fair cash value of corporate capital stock, including franchises, a resolution of such board, adopted for such avowed purpose, providing that the capital stock should be valued as an entirety with due consideration to the character and duration of the franchise, the contribution paid to the municipality pursuant to ordinance as compensation for the franchise or privileges, the highest and lowest stock quotations, and number of sales of stock during the year, and any other fact or circumstance assisting to fix the value of the capital stock; and then that the assessed or equalized value of the tangible property, wherever located, should be deducted, and the balance, if any, taken as the amount and fair cash value of the capital stock, including the franchise in any given case,—did not prescribe a correct and lawful method of determining the assessed valuation of the capital stock of corporations over and above the equalized and assessed valuation of the tangible property, because there was left entirely out of consideration the value of the corporate funded debt, and without taking account of that the value of the capital stock and franchise cannot be accurately determined. Ibid.

The corporations affected by these rulings promptly sought to prevent the application thereof to themselves. The attempt to prevent the state board from assessing them over again under stress of a mandamus in the last-cited case failed. The Federal court, in refusing an injunction upon divers grounds, said, however, that the state board of equalization was clothed with quasi judicial functions in assessing domestic corporations upon their capital stocks and franchises at the fair cash value thereof, to be ascertained under rules of its own adoption consistent with the statute; and that, although it had been adjudicated that the set of rules the board had adopted to that end were invalid, and the board had been commanded to assess anew a corporation previously assessed under them by taking into consideration its indebtedness other than for current expenses and the sales in the market of the shares of its stock, such board was not to disregard its judicial function by adopting a rigid rule of valuation according to indebtedness and the market prices of shares, but was merely to take these into account as factors in reaching the result commanded. Chicago Union Traction Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization, 112 Fed. 607.

Later, in course of the same litigation, the Federal court declared that in Illinois the rule of valuation for the purposes of taxation of the capital stock and franchises of a corporation requires that the net earnings be ascertained by deducting from the gross receipts the current disbursements, increased debts, and depreciation in use of the tangible property, and then capitalizing at 6 per cent, and reducing the total thus found to the common basis of assessment throughout the state. Chicago Union Traction Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization, 114 Fed. 557.

In the states of Indiana, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and Washington no separate valuation of franchises for taxation is made. These are taxed, but only as associated with corporate property the value of which is more or less affected, usually enhanced, by the franchises in connection with which it is used. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Taggart, 141 Ind. 281, 40 N. E. 1051, Affirmed in 163 U. S. 1, 41 L. ed. 49, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1054; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Henderson, 68 Fed. 588; Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Detroit, 125 Mich. 673, 85 N. W. 96, 86 N. W. 809; Com. v. Delaware, S. & S. R. Co. 165 Pa. 44, 54, 30 Atl. 322, 323; also 3 Dauph. Co. Rep. 249; Com. v. Manor Gas Coal Co. 188 Pa. 195, 41 Atl. 605; Com. v. Ontario, C. & S. R. Co. 188 Pa. 205, 41 Atl. 607; Com. v. Pennsylvania Coal Co. 197 Pa. 551, 47 Atl. 740; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Bate, 12 Lea, 573; Commercial Electric Light & P. Co. v. Judson, 21 Wash. 49, 56 Pac. 829; Chehalis Boom Co. v. Chehalis County, 24 Wash. 135, 63 Pac. 1123.

In New Jersey, under a statute directing the state board of assessors in assessing railroads to value separately (1) the main stem 100 feet wide with its superstructures, (2) the other real estate used for railroad purposes, (3) the tangible personal property, and (4) the franchises,—the method adopted with respect of the franchise of a railroad taxable under the act was to take the amount of the funded and other debts and of the capital stock and ascertain the value thereof; and where the aggregate value exceeded the entire amount of the tangible property, it was lessened by such amount, and 60 per cent of the balance was deemed the value of the franchise; and where that aggregate was less than the total of the tangibles, then the gross earnings of the road were resorted to, and 20 per cent of these taken to represent the value of the franchise. The supreme court did not deem it a duty to express any opinion upon this method, but was concerned only to decide whether, when applied in the case at bar, the result was that the true value of the franchises had thereby been arrived at, and it held that the first process as to productive roads yielded no erroneous results, but that the gross-earnings rule as to unproductive roads resulted in overvaluation. Central R. Co. v. State Bd. of Assessors, 40 N. J. L. 1, 7 Atl. 306.

In Kentucky the state court of appeals decided that in ascertaining the value of a corporate franchise for taxation under a statutory direction to the board of valuation and assessment, from a sworn report from the corporation and such other evidence as might be before it, to deduct the value of all tangible corporate property already assessed from the entire corporate property, real and personal, tangible and intangible, including all assets on hand and the franchise as well all embraced as a unit, and to treat the balance as the worth of the franchise, the body charged with the duty of fixing the tax might justly take as a basis all the assets in the possession of the corporation, although two thirds of these were acquired with borrowed money represented by bonds outstanding and still unpaid. That this was not taxing a debtor on the amount of his indebtedness, but on the property he had that he went into debt to get, and that neither corporations nor individuals were to be credited with their outstanding debts upon their property assessed for taxation. The court said that, by the term "capital stock" in the statutes, the legislature meant to include the entire property, real and personal, tangible and intangible, all assets on hand and the franchise also as an entirety, and, deducting the tangible property already assessed, treat the balance as the value of the franchise to be taxed. Henderson Bridge Co. v. Com. 99 Ky. 623, 29 L. R. A. 73, 31 S. W. 486, Affirmed in 166 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 953, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 532.

In a subsequent case where the same corporation challenged the validity of a later tax, the same court, by Paynter, Ch. J., said, the action involved the right to compel the Henderson Bridge Company to pay its franchise tax for 1897, the franchise having been valued in the same way that it was when the right to collect the tax upon it was involved in the last cited case. Since that time, it was added, the right to collect the franchise tax on valuations under the same law by the same authority and on the same basis has been before this court in Paducah Street R. Co. v. McCracken, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1294, 49 S. W. 178; South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Bellevue, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1184, 49 S. W. 23; Louisville R. Co. v. Com. 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1509, 49 S. W. 486; and Louisville & J. Ferry Co. v. Com. 22 Ky. L. Rep. 446, 57 S. W. 624,—in each of which cases the court expressly or impliedly sustained the valuation and assessment of the franchise. To sustain the attack here necessitates overruling these cases, and this we decline to do. Henderson Bridge Co. v. Negley, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 746, 63 S. W. 989.

If in assessing the tangible property of a railroad under the Kentucky system the commissioners charged with that duty take into consideration the value of the franchise, no ground of complaint is thereby afforded against the assessment of the franchise by the state board of valuation when that body, without increasing the value thereof over previous years, deducts the whole valuation of the tangible property as made by the commissioners. Southern R. Co. v. Coulter, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 203, 68 S. W. 873.

But the Kentucky corporate tax act is deemed really, at least so far as foreign corporations are concerned, to impose a tax only upon property within the state, and not technically upon franchises though these affect the value of the property, since thereby are embraced both tangible and intangible assets, real and personal estate,—all treated as an entirety and assessed in solido. Adams Exp. Co. v. Kentucky, 166 U. S. 171, 41 L. ed. 560, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 527; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Norman, 77 Fed. 13.

In Ohio much the same state of affairs exists. The statute differs from that of Kentucky in verbal respects only, and is interpreted in the same way. State ex rel. Poe v. Jones, 51 Ohio St. 492, 37 N. E. 945; Adams Exp. Co. v. State, 55 Ohio St. 69, 44 N. E. 506, 165 U. S. 194, 41 L. ed. 683, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 305, Rehearing denied in 166 U. S. 185, 41 L. ed. 965, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 604.

The North Carolina Constitution vested in township trustees alone the power to value real estate and personal property, and authorized, without commanding, the legislature to tax franchises. The courts held there was a lack of legislative competency to take away from township authorities their constitutional power to assess corporate tangible property, but that the assessment of franchises might be provided for by means of a state board. The courts did not feel called upon, and would not undertake, to formulate the principles upon which corporate franchises should be valued, but contented themselves with saying that they were capable of valuation apart from the corporate property, and if erroneous principles were applied so that overvaluation resulted the corporations would in proper cases be entitled to relief. Wilmington, C. & A. R. Co. v. Brunswick County, 72 N. C. 10; Richmond & D. R. Co. N. C. Div. v. Brogden, 74 N. C. 707; Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Alamance, 84 N. C. 507; Atlantic, T. & O. R. Co. v. Mecklenburg, 87 N. C. 129.

Since these cases were decided the statute law of North Carolina in point has undergone a change. The present act, called the machinery act (Pub. Laws 1901, chap. 7, §§ 48-50, amending Laws 1899, chap. 15), requires the assessment of corporate franchises apart from tangible property after, but not until, June 1, 1903. Jackson v. Corporation Commission, 130 N. C. 385, 42 S. E. 128.

In Nevada it was said, in 1875, that no principle of valuation was prescribed by the laws of that state; that the statutes defined different species of property, and provided for their assessment at the actual cash value, but that, as to the mode of ascertaining the cash value, the statute law was silent. That no subsidiary principles of valuation were laid down to guide the owner in making a statement in those cases where a statement specifying values was required, and that the assessor was left wholly unrestricted in making his estimate. State v. Central P. R. Co. 10 Nev. 47. The court there justified the unit and entirety rule.

The question of deductions from the data upon which corporate franchises are valued is not less troublesome than the question of the elements to be included therein. Here, again, the rules vary with the varying jurisdictions, and the best that can be done in elucidation is the citation of special instances.

In Connecticut ascertained and unpaid losses owing by a mutual insurance company subject to a franchise tax equal to a stated percentage on the amount of cash capital belonging to it upon a named date are to be deducted in computing such capital. Colts v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 36 Conn. 513.

But such a company is not entitled to deduct the amount of declared but undistributed dividends applicable toward the reduction of premium notes of policy holders not included in the capital account. Ibid.

In Kentucky debts are not deductible. Henderson Bridge Co. v. Com. 99 Ky. 623, 29 L. R. A. 73, 31 S. W. 486; Paducah Street R. Co. v. McCracken, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1294, 49 S. W. 178.

As the Massachusetts statute for taxing corporations according to the aggregate market value of their shares of stock only provided for deducting real estate and machinery locally taxed, a corporation taxable thereunder was not entitled to a deduction of any other taxable property it possessed. Com. v. New England Slate & Tile Co. 13 Allen, 391.

And it is no answer to an application by a Massachusetts corporation for a reduction of an assessment upon its real estate and machinery that the assessed valuation as it stands was deducted in assessing its franchise tax from the fair cash value of its shares. The two taxes are not complementary,—intended to divide between them the corporate property. Tremont & S. Mills v. Lowell, 178 Mass. 469, 59 N. E. 1007.

corporate franchise of a domestic corporation which has paid 6 per cent or more dividends under a statute providing that every domestic corporation, and every foreign one, doing business in that state shall be liable to, and pay, a tax as a tax upon its franchise or business, into the state treasury annually, computed, when during the year a dividend of 6 per cent or more has been declared upon the par value of the capital stock, at a stated rate upon the capital stock for each 1 per cent of dividend so declared, and in the case of a corporation paying no dividend or less than 6 per cent dividend, at another rate upon each dollar of the valuation of the capital made according to a method therein prescribed,—the tax is based on the par value of the stock, and hence it is immaterial what the amount of the assets are, nor are the corporate debts deductible. People ex rel. Jewelers' Circular Pub. Co. v. Roberts, 155 N. Y. 1, 49 N. E. 248.

It is otherwise in the case of a nondividend paying corporation where the basis of the tax is the actual, and not the par, value of the capital stock. People ex rel. Wiebusch & H. Co. v. Roberts, 154 N. Y. 101, 47 N. E. 980.

In Pennsylvania, under the act of June 8, 1891 (P. L. 229), in valuing the capital stock, including the franchise of a corporation, the corporate debts are facts relevant to take into account, but not specifically to be deducted. Com. v. New York, P. & O. R. Co. 188 Pa. 169, 41 Atl. 594; Com. v. Manor Gas Coal Co. 188 Pa. 195, 41 Atl. 605; Com. v. Beech Creek R. Co. 188 Pa. 203, 41 Atl. 605; Com. v. Shamokin, S. & L. R. Co. 3 Dauph. Co. Rep. 168; Com. v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 3 Dauph. Co. Rep. 172; Com. v. Mammoth Vein Coal & I. Co. 3 Dauph. Co. Rep. 220; Com. v. Jamestown & F. R. Co. 3 Dauph. Co. Rep. 214.

X. Administration and relief.

In this division no attempt has been made to collate the almost innumerable decisions relating to defects and irregularities, objections, acts, and omissions of either public officers in assessing and collecting, or taxpayers in reviewing or resisting taxes, or respecting suits, actions, or special proceedings, points of practice or procedure, or rights and remedies which the authorities on the one hand, or taxpayers on the other, must or may pursue or have in enforcing, contesting, or recovering back taxes, except in so far only as the cases in point have had peculiar and appropriate application to the particular kind of taxation that is the subject of this note. There have been several of these, but they do not lend themselves to systemization.

When a state imposes a specific tax upon the franchises of corporations doing business within its borders, and requires every such corporation to take out a license, not only as evidence of the payment of the tax, but also as a condition upon which its privileges may be exercised or its business pursued; and a county is without any legal authority to add thereto a county tax,—the refusal of the proper officer to issue a license to a corporation applying for one and entitled to have it, unless it will pay an additional county tax, does not justify such corporation in carrying on business without such license, nor save it from the pains and penalties of so doing; but its remedy is by mandamus to the officer to compel him to issue the license. Phoenix Carpet Co. v. State, 118 Ala. 143, 22 So. 627.

When a railroad has and operates under two franchises, one from the state subject to state taxation, and the other from the United States and exempt therefrom, and makes, as required—by a state statute, a written statement to a state board for the purpose of being assessed upon its franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails and rolling stock, stating in a lump amount the value thereof within the state, while it is not of necessity concluded thereby from showing the contrary, yet in the absence of qualification or opposing proof, it is presumed that the taxable, and not the exempt, franchise was meant, and a general assessment accordingly is valid. People v. Central P. R. Co. 105 Cal. 578, 38 Pac. 905.

Where, under a statutory system of railroad taxation, the value of each railroad, its rights, franchises, and property for the purposes of taxation is assessed by a state board whose determination is made conclusive, and the basis of whose action is a sworn return made by the railroad annually in January covering sundry items showing its condition, including the number and market value of its shares of stock and its cash on hand on the first day of the month, the amount of which is to be deducted in fixing the assessment, but which statement such board has the right and power to correct; if an assessment is made and the tax accordingly paid, the state can recover no additional sum, although it afterwards turns out that the item deducted as cash on hand was much too large because of including many elements not properly so classified, and this although the board had too limited a time and no power to summon witnesses and investigate books to learn the truth. State v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 60 Conn. 326, 22 Atl. 765.

When the Constitution and statutes commit to officers selected for the purpose the duty of assessing the capital stock and franchises of corporations, and provide for no review by the judicial branch of the government, the courts are powerless to reduce an overvaluation when the assessors act without fraud and according to law. Ottawa Glass Co. v. McCaleb, 81 Ill. 557; Coal Run Coal Co. v. Finlen, 124 Ill. 666, 17 N. E. 11.

The omission of a corporation to make the required statutory return to the board of equalization as the basis for that body to assess its capital stock and franchise because it was not supplied with blank forms and instructions, nor was any return demanded of it, does not invalidate a tax laid upon its capital stock and franchise when the assessing board is charged by law to value the capital stock and franchises of corporations, is empowered to do so upon other evidence than corporate returns afford, and acts at public meetings where corporations have full opportunity to appear and be heard. Pacific Hotel Co. v. Lieb, 83 Ill. 602, followed in Elgin City Bkg. Co. v. Eaton, 3 Ill. App. 432.

It is not a valid objection that the valuation of the capital stock and franchise of a railroad corporation using and operating a line of railroad, of which it owns in fee three-fifths and leases two-fifths from other roads of the mileage of the main track, is distributed to counties where only leased lines are operated, when the taxing statute requires that the aggregate assessment on capital stock and franchises shall be distributed proportionately to the several counties in like manner that the property denominated railroad track is distributed, which is in proportion that the length of the main track in each county bears to the whole length of the road in the state; and when lines leased, as well as those owned, are in express terms taxable to the corporation using and operating them as a part of its general system under charter authority. Huck v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 86 Ill. 352.

without any basis of fact in valuing the capital stock and franchise of a railroad corporation for the purpose of taxation is unsustainable when there was before it a return purporting to emanate from a representative of the corporation in conformity with a statute requiring such a return to be made by the corporation, since the board had a right to rely thereon in the absence of any showing that it was untrue or incorrect. Union Trust Co. v. Weber, 96 Ill. 846.

The validity of such tax is not in the least affected by the omission of such board properly to apportion the proceeds thereof among the counties thereunto entitled, nor by its improper distribution thereof. The road is not injured,—it cannot be called upon to pay twice, nor any more. It is for a county deprived of its just share to complain and seek redress from the state or the offending officers. Ibid.

There is a dictum in that case that the right of way, depot grounds, railroad track, and franchise of a railroad corporation are liable to taxation without reference to their ownership, and that the listing them in the wrong name as owner affords no ground for enjoining the tax, in no wise renders it inequitable and unjust. The proposition is without weight, as in the particular case the court held that the listing was to the real owner by name, and the chief justice, in concurring in the result, was careful to withhold his assent from the views expressed in the opinion. Ibid.

When a law requires corporations to furnish, for the purposes of taxation, to a public officer a statement under oath in a form he prescribes, showing certain facts, and makes it his duty, in case such statement is not furnished, to obtain the useful information by other means, and lay it before the state board of assessment and equalization as a basis for its action, the submission of an unsworn statement is equivalent to rendering none at all, and leaves a corporation in that situation without ground of complaint that the valuation set down by it in the unverified statement was increased without any notice to it. Iowa & D. Teleph. Co. v. Schamber (S. D.) 91 N. W. 78.

A statute making it a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of $1,000, and $50 a day additional, for a corporation or its officers wilfully to fail or to refuse to make a report to the state auditor as the basis of a tax upon the corporate franchise, is infringed, and the penalty therein prescribed is incurred, by the mere omission to make such a report, without any proof of actual knowledge of the law (since everyone is presumed to know the law), or of a demand or request from the auditor, or of any notice to the corporation. It is sufficient that the failure is voluntary. Louisville & J. Ferry Co. v. Com. 104 Ky. 726, 47 S. W. 877. This ruling simply nullifies the word "wilfully" in a penal statute.

The law involved required the auditor to prescribe the form of such corporate report, but the court held that this did not charge him with any duty to furnish such form to the corporations required to report, nor even to notify any corporation to make a report, in spite of the heavy penalties imposed for wilful failure or refusal to do so. Ibid.

The court thought it involved too much expense, and entailed too much labor upon the auditor, to go or send to corporations throughout the state, and that he was not, in the absence of explicit statutory direction, bound to undertake this labor. The corporations knew the law and where to find the auditor.

It may be remarked, in passing, that the comptroller of the state of New York performs just that labor without difficulty, notwithstanding the disparity in the area of and number of corporations in the Empire state in comparison with the extent of and companies in Kentucky.

The validity of a tax upon corporate franchises assessed by a state board acting upon reports from the corporations themselves and such other evidence as may come before it is unaffected by the circumstance that no appeal is allowed from its determination. Paducah Street R. Co. v. McCracken, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1294, 49 S. W. 178.

When the statute provides that should any corporation fail to report annually on or before a stated date the state board shall proceed to ascertain the facts and value the franchise for taxation it is intended that such board may exercise its power at any time, especially as a further section provides for the calling of it together from time to time as the business of the board requires. Such board therefore may, when no reports have been made, assess the corporation in default upon its franchise for several past years. Louisville & J. Ferry Co. v. Com. 22 Ky. L. Rep. 446, 57 S. W. 624; Stone v. Louisville, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 423, 57 S. W. 627.

When there is no statutory provision to the contrary, a corporate franchise is taxable where the corporation has its head office, and in the case of a local water corporation whose entire franchise is taxable in a city, although it is partly exercised beyond the city limits, the state board of valuation may be constrained to refrain from apportioning the tax to jurisdictions outside such city. Frankfort v. Stone, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 25, 56 S. W. 679, Rehearing denied in 22 Ky. L. Rep. 502, 58 S. W. 373.

A tax assessed according to law upon the corporate franchise of a bridge company by a state board is not invalidated by the work of computation having been intrusted to a clerk working under the direction and supervision of such board. Louisville Bridge Co. v. Louisville, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1655, 65 S. W. 814.

Under the Kentucky system of railroad taxation the tangible property is assessable by the state railroad commissioners and the franchise by the state board of valuation and assessment. Southern R. Co. v. Coulter, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 203, 68 S. W. 873.

And when, under such system, the state board of valuation and assessment decides that a railroad corporation is not liable to a local tax upon its franchise for a given year or years because by a mistaken construction of the statute it supposed that the local tangible property must be deducted from the apportioned value of the franchise, which was ascertained in the first instance by a general deduction of all the tangibles, so that for such year or years no local tax upon the franchise was assessed or paid, the railroad thereunto liable is not discharged, nor is the public estopped from assessing it for such tax in subsequent years. Ibid.

Notwithstanding the language of the franchise tax statute in providing for the payment by corporations, in addition to other taxes imposed by law, of a state tax upon their franchises and a local tax thereon in the several subdivisions where they are exercised, and for a state board to value them according to rules, whereby is taken the grand total value of everything possessed by a given corporation subject to the taxes, from which the total value of its tangibles is deducted and the balance deemed the value of its franchise; and in then providing for an apportionment in the case of railroad and other transportation and transmission companies for local franchise taxes according to mileage, "less the value of any tangible property assessed or liable to assessment" in the local district,—the local tangible property is not to be taken out a second time. Ibid. 57 L. R. A.

A statute providing that any corporation aggrieved by a tax levied as an excise upon the value of its capital stock according to the market value of its shares may petition the supreme court in the nature of a petition of right setting forth the amount of the tax or excise and the general legal grounds, if any, for asserting that it should not have been exacted, and the specific facts upon which such assertion rests, confers no jurisdiction to correct errors of judgment resulting merely in an overvaluation of the shares, although the corporation insists that if these had been correctly valued there could and would have been no tax at all assessed, because the lawful deductions for property otherwise taxed exceed the total real value of the shares. Boston Mfg. Co. v. Com. 144 Mass. 598, 12 N. E. 362.

To sustain a charge of excessive valuation of corporate property and franchise so as to warrant a court in interfering with an assessment, the proof offered must relate to the values at the time of which the assessment speaks. In the absence of any proof but that which relates to an anterior time, the valuation must stand. State, Williams, Prosecutor, v. Bettie, 50 N. J. L. 132, 11 Atl. 17.

In New Jersey a domestic railroad corporation operating a steam surface railway between two cities, and still occasionally using its railroad tracks upon the highways of one of such cities for steam surface railroad purposes; and which in the same connection owns a powerhouse, poles, dynamos, cars, and other equipment of an electric passenger railway operated over the same tracks in such city,—is to be assessed and taxed by the state board of assessors upon its tracks and franchise, and by the municipality upon the electric line and its equipment as property not used for railroad purposes. Camden & A. R. Co. v. Atlantic City, 38 N. J. L. 316; 83 Atl. 198.

Notwithstanding a statute imposing a franchise tax upon a domestic railroad corporation, measured by its gross receipts, points out methods of collection, and reserves no lien upon the property, when a corporation becomes insolvent, and passes into the hands of operating receivers under sequestration proceedings instituted by a judgment creditor, and under mortgage foreclosure for debts exceeding the total assets,—the state may apply directly to the court whose officers such receivers are for and obtain an order directing them to pay the taxes in default out of the gross earnings on hand. Central Trust Co. v. New York City & N. E. Co. 110 N. Y. 250, 1 L. R. A. 260, 18 N. E. 92.

When, under the New York statutes, an application is made to the state comptroller by a domestic railroad corporation for a revision or readjustment of franchise taxes assessed upon it in past years, the affidavit of verification appended to the petition purporting to be that of an officer of the corporation is not fatally defective in not being signed by the affiant, when he is named therein and has signed the petition. Nor is it insufficient because of qualifying the oath that the facts set up in the petition are true by the words "to the best of the deponent's knowledge and belief." People v. Campbell, 86 Hun, 544, 34 N. Y. Supp. 801.

Such a petition affords jurisdiction to the state comptroller to revise and readjust the taxes according to its prayer, when the railroad officer subscribing and verifying it states in the body of it that he has examined the records kept by the railroad during the years involved, and that as shown by said records a certain part of the capital stock was employed without the state during that time, without added proof that the corporate books and records were correct. Ibid.

The courts are not governed by the rules applicable to appeals from judgments in actions at law in reviewing a decision of the comptroller on such an application. The strict rules of evidence in actions do not apply to such a proceeding. The comptroller is not restricted to common-law proof, but may act upon affidavits (citing People ex rel. Harlan & H. Co. v. Campbell, 139 N. Y. 63, 34 N. E. 753). He is in fact an assessor, and may determine matters before him upon evidence which would be inadmissible in common-law actions. (Citing People ex rel. Roebbing's Sons Co. v. Wample, 138 N. Y. 582, 34 N. E. 386.) Ibid.

That the state comptroller decided that taxes for a given year should be canceled on the ground that the subject thereof was exempt constitutes no estoppel upon his successor in office from assessing like taxes upon the same subject in later years. People ex rel. New England Dressed Meat & Wool Co. v. Roberts, 155 N. Y. 408, 41 L. R. A. 228, 50 N. E. 53, Reversing 20 App. Div. 521, 47 N. Y. Supp. 123.

When a franchise tax against a domestic corporation has been revised by the state comptroller, and a part thereof credited to the corporation as illegally paid, or as made to include taxes which could not have been lawfully demanded, a second domestic corporation, assignee of the first for a part of such credit, is not entitled to have its own tax account reduced by the transferred credit. The power given to the state comptroller to revise and readjust an account for taxes as above, and to charge or credit the difference as the case may require, is not sufficient to require him to transfer a credit. He has no authority to direct the refunding of a tax covered into the state treasury. There is no right in a corporation to offset its claim for taxes unlawfully exacted against the state's claim for other taxes. People ex rel. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Roberts, 30 App. Div. 78, 51 N. Y. Supp. 747, Affirmed on opinion below in 156 N. Y. 693, 51 N. E. 1093.

Although the New York statute (Laws 1896, chap. 908, § 252) requires the assessors, in making their return to a writ of certiorari to review their action, to set forth, concisely, such other facts as may be pertinent and material to show the value of the property assessed on the roll and the grounds for the valuation, it is improper to insert in a writ to the state board to review an assessment upon the special franchises of a corporation a requirement that the return shall include the manner of making the assessment, the method pursued in making and fixing the valuation, and the basis adopted therefor; since, if such direction be construed to require more than does the statute, it is unauthorized, and if it requires no more, it is unnecessary. People ex rel. Buffalo Natural Gas Fuel Co. v. State Bd. of Tax Comrs. 55 App. Div. 186, 67 N. Y. Supp. 51.

(This is quite the same reason by which the Caliph Omar justified the famous order to burn the Alexandrian library,—if the books conformed to Al Koran they were superfluous, and if they did not they were pernicious.)

There is a strong dissent in the case by Kellogg, J., who took the ground that the phrase, "such other facts as may be pertinent," meant such other facts as the court called upon to review deems to be pertinent.

Under the New York statute for the taxation of special franchises (Laws 1899, chap. 712) the requirement (§ 43) that every corporation subject thereto shall, within thirty days after the act takes effect, or within the like period after a franchise is acquired, furnish a written report to the state tax commissioners as a basis for assessment; and the coupled provision for the payment of a specific pecuniary penalty for failure to make such report, with an additional diurnal money penalty while the default continues; and a further provision that the corporation thus defaulting shall not be entitled to review its assessment upon certiorari,—the right of review upon certiorari is suspended while the default continues, not absolutely lost, to a corporation assessed upon its special franchise, by the failure to report within the time limit. The right of review may be exercised upon subsequently reporting and satisfying the pecuniary penalties. People ex rel. New York & Q. C. R. Co. v. State Bd. of Tax Comrs. 55 App. Div. 218, 67 N. Y. Supp. 69.

A statute requiring every domestic trust company to pay for the privilege of exercising its corporate franchise, or of carrying on its business in an organized capacity, an annual tax equal to 1 per cent on the amount of its capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits, on or before a named date each year in lieu of and as a substitute for all other assessments and taxation, from which such trust companies are thereby expressly exempted, and which took effect immediately upon its enactment (N. Y. Laws 1901, chap. 132), entitles a trust company that has complied with its terms to recover back a city tax assessed before the act became a law for the year in which it was passed, but not confirmed until afterwards, and which was collected by duress, and paid under protest. Binghamton Trust Co. v. Binghamton, 72 App. Div. 341, 76 N. Y. Supp. 517.

When a state constitution commits to township officers the power and duty of assessing the taxable property in their respective towns, and merely authorizes, without commanding, the legislature to tax franchisees; and when the legislature has enacted general laws for taxing real and personal property through the action of township officials, and a particular law for taxing corporate franchisees through the action of a state board,—the lands, roadbed, superstructures, and other tangible property of a railroad corporation are to be assessed and taxed where they are situated by the local taxing authorities under the general legislation, and the franchise separately and independently by the state board. And if by mistake, mutual on the part of the state board and the railroad, the corporation returns and is assessed and taxed upon, not only its franchise, but all its tangible property as well, and pays such tax, the payment is no defense to the claim of the local authorities for taxes assessed by them upon the tangible property. Wilmington, C. & A. R. Co. v. Brunswick County, 72 N. C. 10; Wilmington R. Bridge Co. v. New Hanover County, 72 N. C. 15.

A charge that a board of equalization assessed corporate franchisees for taxation without notice to the corporation is unsubstantiated when it appears that such board, upon an application to reduce the assessment, left the original assessment unchanged, and that the corporate franchisees were included therein. Edison Electric Illum. Co. v. Spokane County, 22 Wash. 168, 60 Pac. 132.

The franchises of a street railway corporation and the property necessary for their exercise to discharge quasi public duties, being an entirety, and the franchisees being personal estate, the tangible property, such as cars, rails, poles, wires, etc., and the power house or houses and the lots they stand on, are subject to assessment as part of the franchise, and therefore as personal property; hence drawn to the principal office of the corporate owner, and not having a situs in the wards or assessment districts where these things happen severally to be situated. State ex rel. Milwaukee Street R. Co. v. Anderson, 90 Wis. 550, 63 N. W. 746.

Such franchises and property are not subject to severance by sale for taxes under the general operation of the tax law, nor upon other legal process. Ibid.; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Forest County, 95 Wis. 80, 70 N. W. 77.

XI. Conclusion.

If the foregoing exposition has left unanswered many questions, it has been inevitable. The subject of taxing corporate franchises is still in the evolutionary stage. The states are continually devising new ways of taxing corporations, and the corporations are stubbornly contesting every new impost. Mr. Thomas Sewell Adams, writing of Taxation in Maryland, for the Johns Hopkins University Studies in History and Political Science, says that in the period from 1776 to 1841 that state taxed corporations exactly like individuals, but customarily imposed upon banks a franchise tax, usually twenty cents on each $100 of paid-up capital, and that in the last two decades of the nineteenth century corporation taxes increased both relatively and absolutely, and many new ones were imposed, adding that, whereas in the ninth decade of the last century these were 13 per cent of the total tax receipts, in the succeeding ten years they had risen to 16 per cent. The case of Maryland is typical.

It is sometimes possible as yet for a few corporations to escape the more grievous burdens by migrating to more liberal jurisdictions (vide, People ex rel. Davis Colby Ore Roaster Co. v. Campbell, 66 Hun, 146, 21 N. Y. Supp. 7; People ex rel. Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wemple, 131 N. Y. 64, 29 N. E. 1002; and People ex rel. Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Roberts, 25 App. Div. 13, 48 N. Y. Supp. 1028), but plainly this plan is not available to all, and the places of refuge are diminishing.

The great question, When is a tax upon a corporation to be considered a franchise tax rather than one upon its property? is still open. The language of the statute imposing it is not decisive. It may be one or the other despite of the words employed by the legislature. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Atty. Gen. 125 U. S. 530, 31 L. ed. 790, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Norman, 77 Fed. 13; Adams Exp. Co. v. Kentucky, 166 U. S. 171, 41 L. ed. 980, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 527,—in which avowed franchise taxes that would, if such, have been invalid, were held to be not such; and Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 3 Intern. Com. Rep. 807, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 163, where the tax was only saved by a ruling that it was a franchise tax.

Again, notwithstanding the last cited case, it cannot yet be said to be settled that a state may impose upon a foreign corporation engaged exclusively in interstate commerce any tax for the privilege of carrying on such commerce within its borders. At least, Mr. Justice Peckham did not so regard it when writing the opinion in McHenry v. Alford, 168 U. S. 651, 42 L. ed. 614, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 624.

But when it is settled that a given tax is an excise, the question as to what the value of the franchise is, and how it shall be determined, is a fruitful source of litigation. Witness the cases of State Bd. of Equalization v. People ex rel. Goggin, 191 Ill. 528, 61 N. E. 339, and Chicago Union Traction Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization, 112 Fed. 607, 114 Fed. 557.

The corporation wronged by an excessive valuation may get relief in the courts if it can prove actual fraud by the assessors; not otherwise. There is a remedy for knavishness, possibly, but none for ignorance or stupid obstinacy.

But while all this is so, none the less, the courts have established many guiding principles that must be helpful in solving the new problems connected with this subject that are sure to arise. J. B. G.

1. An exception covering several distinct propositions of the charge to the jury is insufficient if either proposition is correct.
2. An exception "to the court's measure of damages" is sufficient if the charge on the measure of damages constitutes a single subject, and the circumstances are such that the judge could not have misapprehended the scope of the exception.
3. The damages for fraudulent representations inducing the purchase of corporate stock cannot be limited to the difference in the value of the stock on the day the representations were made and on the day of purchase, if at both dates it was of much less intrinsic value than the price paid for it, but should represent the difference between the price paid and the intrinsic value of the stock as ascertained by events in the subsequent history of the corporation, and not by the market price.

4. That the discount of subscribers' notes indorsed by an insurance company, by the bank in which they were deposited as capital, was genuine and real, does not prevent its certificate that the company's capital and surplus had been paid in, in cash, from being false and misleading.

ration in reliance on representations as to its condition was partly induced to purchase by the desire to secure an agency will not defeat his right to recover against the one making the representations.

6. To show the intrinsic value of the stock of an insurance company, the purchase of which was induced by fraud, the history of bank certificates of deposit representing notes of agents which are to be repaid out of the business done, and which certificates have been placed with the bank as part of the capital stock, may be shown.
7. A bank is liable for the act of its cashier in falsely certifying that the capital of an insurance company is all paid in and on deposit in the bank, if made in the general course of the bank's business from facts supposed to be known to him, although the giving of such a certificate is ultra vires the bank, if it is not sufficiently so to carry notice to all of its ultra vires character.
8. A statement by the cashier of a bank to one inquiring into the condition of one of its corporation customers, dividing its deposit into capital and surplus, is binding on the bank.
9. A bank falsely certifying that an insurance company has its authorized capital on deposit, for the purpose of inducing the insurance commissioner to grant it a license, is liable to persons who are damaged by the purchase of the stock in reliance thereon, if it is intended for the information of all who shall be disposed to deal in the company's stock, or to one who, desiring to purchase stock, applies to the bank for information and is referred to the certificate, and who purchases in reliance thereon.
10. A representation of fact with the intent to influence the conduct of another implies necessarily the belief of the person making it that it is true.
11. The jury may find that a statement by a bank cashier, that one of its corporation depositors had its entire authorized capital on deposit, made with no knowledge of the fact, is knowingly false, for the purpose of holding the bank liable for the results of the misrepresentation in case it is false and causes injury to one relying on it.
12. One who knowingly makes false representations in respect to the capital of a corporation, for the purpose of inducing another to buy its stock, is liable to him for the loss sustained by the purchase of the stock in reliance upon the truth of the statement.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action to recover damages for false and fraudulent representations which were alleged to have induced plaintiff to purchase worthless stock of an insurance company. Reversed.

Statement by Lurton, Circuit Judge:

This was an action by Thomas C. Hindman to recover damages for the fraudulent and false representations of the defendants, whereby he was induced to buy shares of the capital stock of the Columbian Fire Insurance Company of America, which shares have proved worthless. A demurrer to the petition was sustained, and the plaintiff's petition dismissed. At a former term of this court we held that the court below had erred in sustaining the demurrer, and the cause was remanded, with directions to overrule same. 48 L. R. A. 210, 39 C. C. A. 1, 98 Fed. 502. Thereupon the defendants answered, and issue was joined. There was a verdict and judgment for defendants.

The outlines of the case necessary to be stated are these: The insurance company in which Mr. Hindman became a shareholder was a Kentucky corporation. Under the law of that state, it could not begin business until all of its capital had been actually paid in, in cash, nor until the state insurance commissioner should be satisfied that this was a fact, and should issue his license accordingly. On December 31, 1892, he authorized the company to begin business, and issued a certificate or license, which, among other things, certified that the company "had a paid-up capital of \$200,000, and a net surplus of \$48,182.90, which is in cash, and deposited in the First National Bank of Louisville, Kentucky, as shown by the certificate of the cashier of said bank and the sworn statement of the president and secretary of said company." The cashier's certificate referred to is in these words: "Thos. R. Sinton, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is cashier of the First National Bank of Louisville, Kentucky, and that said bank, on this December 31, 1892, has on deposit to the credit of the Columbian Fire Insurance Company of America, of Louisville, Kentucky, two hundred and forty-eight thousand one hundred and eighty-two and $\frac{90}{100}$ (\$248,182.90) dollars, of which amount two hundred thousand (\$200,000) dollars has been paid in as the full amount of the capital stock of said Columbian Fire Insurance Company of America, and forty-eight thousand one hundred and eighty-two and $\frac{90}{100}$ (\$48,182.90) dollars has been paid in as the net surplus of said company." There was evidence tending to show that there was a shortage in paid-up capital shares of not less than \$100,000 when these certificates were issued and the company launched in business. It was shown that the company did have a deposit in the First National Bank on that date of \$248,182.90, which was subject to its check. But there was also evidence tending to show that about \$60,000 of this sum was proceeds of notes discounted by the insurance company, purporting to be notes made by subscribers for shares, and secured by stock attached as collateral, and that the insurance company was bound on these notes either as indorser or guarantor. There was also evidence tending to show that \$25,000 of this credit was made up by the deposit of a certificate of deposit issued by the Tradesman's National Bank of New York, and that this deposit was procured by the discount in New York of the note of the New York agents of the company upon an agreement by which the premiums received by the New York agents were to be deposited with the Tradesman's Bank, and appropriated to the payment of the discounted note; the note being also secured by shares of the company as a collateral. It was not shown that the bank knew the history of this certificate of deposit, though it is shown that it was requested to hold the certificate for thirty days, and that in fact it was so held until March 23d before being sent on for collection. Five of the notes discounted by the defendant bank were notes purporting to be made by subscribers for stock, and these notes were secured by the shares and the indorsement of the company. The sixth note discounted by the defendant bank was made by Mr. A. W. Hart, the principal organizer of the company, and its general manager. Hart's note was for \$46,875. It was discounted December 28, 1892. Shares aggregating 375 were attached to it as collateral, and it was indorsed or guaranteed by the company. Hart was not financially good for this sum, or anything like it. There was evidence tending to show that the officials of the bank knew that this note was made to take the place of subscribers who had failed to take their stock, and that it was represented to the bank that there were persons who had promised to take these shares, who were good, and that as they came forward and took the stock the proceeds of such allotments would be paid on the note, and stock withdrawn in proportion to payments. Mr. Hart himself testified that he told the officials of the bank that it was desired to begin business January 1, 1893, and urged as a reason for discounting this and other notes standing for stock that "we would have a large account in the bank, and would continue always to have a large balance for the necessities of the business, and that the stock would be taken up, and the notes would be paid." It may therefore be stated that there was evidence tending to show that the bank knew that at least to the extent of \$60,000 the capital stock of the bank had not been paid in when the certificate of December 31, 1892, was made, and that to this extent, at least, the statement in the certificate was misleading and deceptive, inasmuch as to that extent the deposit did not represent capital stock or surplus paid in, but arose from discounted paper upon which the company was liable.

In January, 1893, Mr. Hindman began negotiations with the insurance company looking to securing the general agency for California, his dealings being chiefly with A. W. Hart, the company's general manager, and Mr. C. B. Sullivan, one of the defendants, who was actively engaged as a member of its executive committee. He testified that these gentlemen pressed upon him the necessity of becoming a shareholder, as it was the policy of the company to have its important agents interested in that way; and that in answer to his inquiries they represented that the entire capital had been paid in at a premium of 25 per cent; that some subscribers had not taken their stock, but that such stock had been taken by other of the promoters, who had therefore acquired more stock than they wished; and that he could have eighty shares of stock so taken. He says that he was referred to the defendant bank as the company's depository for information as to the capital of the company. He further testified that he did call at the bank, and was informed by its president that the stock was good, and that the bank had made a statement to the insurance commissioner showing that its entire capital had been paid in and was on deposit, and that such a statement would not have been made unless true. He further testifies that he subsequently visited the state insurance commissioner, and asked to see the certificate of the bank, and was shown same; and that, in reliance upon the truth of that certificate, and of like statements made by defendant Sullivan and others, he agreed to take, and did take and pay for, eighty shares in the capital of the company, paying therefor, on February 6, 1893, the sum of $10,000. The stock delivered to him was part of the stock attached as collateral to the note of A. W. Hart, above referred to, which shares purported to have been originally issued to the defendant C. B. Sullivan. In about one year the company failed. Its assets were insufficient to pay its debts. The shareholders will receive nothing. Mr. Hindman did not discover the facts stated in respect to the shortage in capital until after the failure of the company, and still holds his shares.

Argued before Lurton, Day, and Severens, Circuit Judges.

Mr. A. M. Rutledge, with Mr. W. W. Thum, for plaintiff in error:

It being proper to give a true statement of the condition of the insurance company to the insurance commissioner, the bank could not escape liability if a false statement were made and anyone were directly injured thereby.

A civil action for damages growing out of a fraudulent conspiracy warrants a verdict against a single defendant, even though no other persons be implicated, if the fraud and the injury be proved. The gist of the civil action for damages is simply the injury done to the plaintiff.

It is not essential to prove an agreement between the insurance company and the bank, if the bank, in the furtherance of its own business interests, with the purpose of getting the Kentucky insurance commissioner to license the insurance company, gave the false affidavit in question; and if the company was licensed thereby, and the plaintiff injured, then a right of recovery exists.

Hindman v. First Nat. Bank, 48 L. R. A. 210, 39 C. C. A. 1, 98 Fed. 562.

Neither the presence nor the privity of a president is essential, because the giving of such information, provided that it is in the interest of the bank's business, is directly within the scope of the cashier's authority.

On what theory could the difference between the value of the stock as of the date of the cashier's affidavit, and its value as of the date of Hindman's purchase, be the measure of his damage? Under the true rule relating to damages in such case, it is not necessary to show that the fraud had injured the market value of the stock. It is only necessary to show that the true value of the stock by reason of the frauds was substantially less than the price paid.

Loss is the difference between what was paid for it and what the stock was actually worth.

When the bank started the company by fraudulently deceiving the insurance commissioner, it took a step which made it absolutely liable. It was the common purpose, not only to organize and float this bubble company, but to sell the stock attached to the notes on which the company had been organized. The pleadings show that this was the intention from the beginning, and, this being the case, all the conspirators are equally liable for the representations of each, and all are responsible, because they have all done something in furtherance of the common object.

For a cashier to give to the insurance commissioner of Kentucky a sworn certificate which is false and fraudulent, and on the faith of which the commissioner issues a license to the insurance company to do business, will give rise to an action in tort against the bank in favor of one who buys the stock of the company, and is thereby damaged, if the certificate was made in the interest of the bank and in order to have the insurance company licensed and floated, with a purpose on the part of the bank to secure deposits and to sell collateral pledged on notes discounted in the bank.

Messrs. Dodd & Dodd, and Humphrey, Burnett, & Humphrey, for defendants in error:

There was a total failure of proof conducing, in any degree, to show that the certificate of the cashier, Sinton, was made by order of the board of directors of the bank. It may be conceded that a cashier can bind his bank for contracts or torts committed in the course of the corporate business and of his employment, but to extend this principle beyond that limit would be to enable every cashier at liberty to wreck his bank in matters outside of the course of the business of the bank and of his employment.

A limit must somewhere be fixed between the near and remote, direct and indirect consequences, beyond which the law will not take cognizance of them. One of the prescribed limits is this,—that the false and fraudulent representations must have been intended to be acted on, in a matter affecting himself, by the party who seeks redress for consequential injuries.

Where a party complains of false representations whereby he was caused to suffer damage in a transaction with some third person, it devolves upon him to show expressly that the alleged wrongdoer intended, or that he may reasonably be supposed under the circumstances to have intended, that the plaintiff should act upon the misrepresentation; and it is not enough to prove that the misrepresentation was made with knowledge of its falsity.

Lurton, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error has presented no less than 182 assignments of error,—an unnecessarily prodigious number. No less than forty-one of these are errors assigned upon the charge of the court. These are all based upon eight exceptions taken to the charge. Objection is made that these exceptions are too general; that each is an exception covering several distinct propositions; and that, if any proposition be good, the whole exception must fail. Johnson v. Garber, 19 C. C. A. 556, 43 U. S. App. 107, 73 Fed. 523. An exception to a charge should be taken before the jury retire. It should be sufficiently definite to call the judge's attention to the particular matter objected to, in order that he may have an opportunity to correct it. Neither should an exception cover two distinct propositions, for such an exception is insufficient if either one should prove correct. Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Jurey, 111 U. S. 596, 28 L. ed. 531, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 566; Bogk v. Gassert, 149 U. S. 25, 37 L. ed. 635, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 57 L. R. A.

738; Holloway v. Dunham, 170 U. S. 619, 42 L. ed. 1107, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 784; Felton v. Newport, 34 C. C. A. 470, 92 Fed. 470. This objection must be regarded as fatal to most of the exceptions taken to the charge as delivered, though there is one objection which may fairly be regarded as sufficiently definite to base assignments of error upon. That exception is in these words: "We desire to also except to the court's measure of damages in this case." What the court had said on this subject was this: "If the jury should conclude that the plaintiff is entitled to recover anything, then the measure of the plaintiff's damages would be the difference between the value of the eighty shares of stock on the 31st day of December, 1892, and its value of February 6, 1893, when the plaintiff bought it. Interest may be allowed on this, if the jury see fit. For any depreciation which may have resulted after the latter date the defendants would not be responsible, inasmuch as that depreciation may have been the result of causes with which the defendants had no connection." This paragraph was followed by some observations upon parts of the evidence, intended as an application of the proposition of law quoted, which did not involve the statement of any new or distinct proposition. This exception has been criticised, but we think the trial judge could not have misapprehended the scope of the exception, and that the charge on this subject of damages may be regarded as constituting a single subject. In dealing with an objection to an exception this court, in Felton v. Newport, 34 C. C. A. 470, 92 Fed. 470, speaking by Circuit Judge Severens, said: "The charge upon this subject was entire, and bound up in a single proposition. If it was erroneous in any substantial particular, it would seem that the exception would reach the error, especially where it pervades the whole instruction given upon the subject." The instruction limited the plaintiff to a recovery of the difference between the value of the shares on December 31, 1892, the day the company was licensed to do business, and February 6, 1893, the date when plaintiff bought his share; in other words, if the shares of the company were worth as much on February 6, 1893, as they had been on December 31, 1892, the plaintiff had sustained no loss, although at both dates the shares may have been of much less intrinsic value than the price paid for them. This instruction was erroneous, and must result in a reversal and a new trial.

In its essence Mr. Hindman's action was a common-law action for deceit. His complaint, in substance, is that he has been led into the purchase of shares in the Columbian Insurance Company, which has proved a most ruinous investment, and that he was induced to buy through reliance upon the certificate made by the defendant bank, upon which that corporation was licensed to do business, and upon like representations made to him, when negotiating, by the defendant Sullivan, who was at least his nominal vendor. There was evidence tending to show that the defendant Sullivan was one of the promoters and corporators of the company, and an active member of its directory; and that Sullivan, to induce Hindman to become interested in the company, made representations in respect to the capital stock of the company in substance identical with those found in the certificate made by the cashier of the defendant bank; and that Sullivan, together with Hart, the company's general manager, referred plaintiff to the bank for a verification of their statements in respect to the company's paid-in capital. In the former opinion of this court we had occasion to point out some of the principles upon which the bank might make itself liable to Mr. Hindman's action, and we will not at this point stop to consider how far the evidence produced tended to make a case against either the bank or Mr. Sullivan. If the bank and Sullivan knowingly made misleading and false statements in respect to the financial condition of the insurance company, upon which Mr. Hindman, under the circumstances, was entitled to rely, and if he was induced thereby to purchase shares, what is the measure of the liability of the defendants? The plaintiff, in reliance upon the representations made by the defendants, has done an act by which he says he has sustained the loss of his entire investment. But does it follow that, because there has been an ultimate loss of his entire investment, that he is entitled to recover that entire loss? He has paid out $10,000. He has received eighty shares of the company's stock. The defendants are responsible only for the difference between the value of that which he received and the price he paid. Compensation is all that he is entitled to. If the stock was worthless when he bought it, the price he paid, with interest, is the measure of his recovery. If, on the other hand, the shares had some intrinsic value, that value should be deducted from the price. That the shares had then and afterwards a market value is of no importance. The plaintiff was under no obligation to sell, and might hold for an investment, if he saw fit. Smith v. Bolles, 132 U. S. 125, 33 L. ed. 279, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 39; Peek v. Derry, L. R. 37 Ch. Div. 541; Smith v. Duffy, 57 N. J. L. 679, 32 Atl. 371. The rule seems to be that the damages recoverable in an action for deceit, where the plaintiff has been induced to purchase shares in reliance upon untrue representations, is the difference between the price paid and the real intrinsic value of such shares at the time of their purchase; and that such value is to be ascertained in the light of subsequent events in the history of the company, and not by the market price. Where the subject of the purchase is tangible property, the real actual value and the market value are for the most part one and the same. But market sales of corporation shares may not be any real indication of real intrinsic value. In Peek v. Derry, L. R. 37 Ch. Div. 541, Cotton, L. J., in commenting upon the injustice of measuring intrinsic value by market price of shares, said: "I do not know whether there was any market in this case, but the market might have been affected by the representations which were made by the defendants which induced the plaintiff to act, and which might have induced others to act."

The ascertainment of the real and intrinsic value of shares in a corporation at a given date presents difficulties which do not occur with respect to more tangible kinds of property. Justice would seem to forbid that in such circumstances the plaintiff should be allowed to gain a benefit by subsequent independent acts tending to depreciate such shares, wholly disconnected with the vice in the company which existed when he acquired his shares. These difficulties were appreciated in Peek v. Derry, cited heretofore; for Lord Cotton, in speaking of subsequent events, said: "Nor do I think he ought to be precluded from taking into account the subsequent events. Although the value of the shares is not to be ascertained at the subsequent period, so as to take into account for the benefit of the plaintiff events subsequent which depreciated their value, yet those events, if they show that the company was originally, with the capital which it had got, a company which was worthless, may, in my opinion, be taken into account as evidence of what was the value of the shares immediately after they were allotted to the plaintiff. So that it may be that, useful as this discussion has been in order to elucidate what ought to be the proper time for ascertaining the value, it may ultimately produce no good result to the defendants. But I think it is in accordance with the cases, and in accordance with the principle, that the real value, and not the market value, is to be ascertained immediately after the day when the shares were allotted to the plaintiff." In the same case, Sir James Hannen, in dealing with this matter of damages in actions for deceit in sales of shares, said: "The question is, How much worse off is the plaintiff than if he had not bought the shares? If he had not bought the shares, he would have had his £4,000 in his pocket. To ascertain his loss, we must deduct from that amount the real value of the thing he got. That must be ascertained by the light of the events which have happened down to the time of the inquiry—not what the shares might have been sold for, because he was not bound to sell them, and subsequent events may show that what the shares might have been sold for was not their true value, but a mistaken estimate of their value." That the price should be reduced by the actual value of the property acquired seems to have the sanction of the Supreme Court, for in Smith v. Bolles, 132 U. S. 125, 130, 33 L. ed. 279, 282, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 39, 40, the court said:

"What the plaintiff paid for the stock was properly put in evidence, not as the basis of the application of the rules in relation to the difference between the contract price and the market or actual value, but as establishing the loss he had sustained in that particular. If the stock had a value in fact, that would necessarily be applied in reduction of the damages."

The falsity of the certificate issued by the cashier of the defendant bank, upon the strength of which the plaintiff claims the insurance commissioner licensed the company, and upon which he claims to have acted in buying this stock, consists in its plain implication that the capital and surplus of the company had been fully paid in, and that this capital and surplus was on deposit, free from all claims and liabilities. The evidence tended to show that probably $100,000 of the capital stock had never been paid in cash, and that the bank officials were quite aware that this was so to at least the extent of $60,000, inasmuch as they knew that the deposit account of the company included proceeds of discounted subscribers' notes to that extent, upon which the company was then bound as indorser or otherwise. That the bank had on deposit $248,182.90 was, doubtless, true, and that this was subject to the check of the company appears to have been also true. That the discounts were absolute, and not "pretended" or "fictitious," may, in a sense, have been also true. But the ground of action in this case consists in the fact that the capital stock of the company had not been paid up in cash, as required by law, and that it was not true that $200,000 of the amount on deposit had "been paid in as the full amount of the capital stock of said Columbian Fire Insurance Company of America, and $48,182.90 has been paid in as the net surplus of said company." If any substantial part of the sum so on deposit arose from the discount of the notes of real or pretended subscribers upon which the insurance company remained liable as indorser or otherwise, then it was not true that $248,182.90 had been paid in as capital and surplus. Whether the discounts made by the bank of such paper were bona fide or "pretended," the result would be the same. The plain purpose of the Kentucky corporation law was to make it a condition upon which such companies might engage in business, that their authorized capital stock should be actually and fully paid in before a license should issue to do business. Shares sold on a credit were not shares paid in, and the discount of notes made by such credit purchasers, upon an indorsement or guaranty of the company itself, would be a fraudulent evasion of the law; and proceeds arising from such discounts would not be capital stock paid in, but borrowed money masquerading as capital. If, therefore, the jury should believe that the bank knew that a large proportion of the sum on deposit arose from proceeds of such notes, it would know that the deposit did not consist of either capital or surplus, and the certificate would be false and misleading, without regard to whether the discounts were "false," "pretended," "fictitious," or genuine and real.

That Mr. Hindman was partly induced to purchase this stock in order to secure an agency is no defense, if his action was in fact influenced by his confidence in the truth of the financial condition of the company as shown by this bank statement. It was competent upon the question of the intrinsic value of the shares, to show what the true condition of the company was at that date. It was competent to show any and every fact touching the various contracts under which this deposit of $248,182.90 had been secured. For this purpose it was competent to show the history of the New York certificate of deposit, and the agreement under which that certificate had been obtained, and how it was finally paid. It was also competent to show the inside history of the organization, including the history of each of the discounted notes, and the mode in which they were subsequently taken up or paid off. The true inquiry will be, What was the real, intrinsic value of the share bought by plaintiff? for his damages must be reduced by deducting that value. Whatever tended to show the want of intrinsic value of shares in a company in the circumstances of this company at the time of the purchase was competent evidence.

The other exceptions to the charge, so far as they bear upon the merits of the case, are insufficient in form to be the basis of an assignment of error. There are, however, a very large number of assignments of error based upon rulings made by the court below during the course of the trial, and a number of other assignments based upon the refusal of the court to give special instructions duly requested. It would be an unnecessary and unprofitable labor to deal with these assignments seriatim. Some of them are good, and some are bad. Neither must we be understood as indorsing the charge of the learned court. It seems to lay altogether too much stress upon the charge of conspiracy, and the averments that the deposit was not bona fide subject to the check of the insurance company. The petition of the plaintiff is unnecessarily rich in vigorous averments, many of which are not essential to the maintenance of an action for fraud and deceit. The gravamen of the plaintiff's case, against both the bank and Sullivan, lay in the alleged falsity of the representation that $248,182.90 had been paid in on account of capital stock and surplus. Whether the bank had conspired with the insurance company, or with Sullivan, or with certain other promoters and managers of the insurance company, for the purpose of foisting on the public an unripe corporation whose capital stock had not been paid in as required by law, constituted one phase of the plaintiff's case. But the plaintiff's case did not altogether depend upon proof of a conspiracy, or upon evidence that the public at large were invited to become purchasers of shares in reliance upon the representations made by either Sullivan or the bank, or both. Facts enough were stated in the plaintiff's voluminous and redundant petition to justify a recovery if the jury should believe that the bank, for its own business purposes, knowingly misrepresented the financial condition of the insurance company, in respect to the nature of its account as a depositor, with the intent that the plaintiff should be induced to buy shares. This aspect of the case was not properly put to the jury, and, inasmuch as the case must go back for a new trial, we shall briefly indicate the general principles upon which such new trial should proceed, without applying our views to particular specifications of error.

1. The implied authority of the cashier to bind the bank by misrepresentations in the statement or certificate which is the foundation of the plaintiff's action against the bank was more than doubted by the court below, and to this question we shall first address ourselves. That the giving of such a certificate at the instance of a customer would not be ultra vires the corporate power of the bank, even if it should include a statement of the purpose for which the deposit had been paid in, was decided in our opinion upon the former writ of error. That question need not be reconsidered or the argument repeated. 48 L. R. A. 210, 39 C. C. A. 1, 98 Fed. 562. We did not there consider the authority of the cashier to bind the bank by false statements in such a certificate. If given by him without the direction of the directors, because the questions then decided arose upon a demurrer to a petition which averred that the cashier acted by order of the board of directors. But how can it be said that, without the authority of the board of directors, the cashier's action in giving such a certificate would not be the act of the bank? This is not an action to enforce a contract made by the cashier. Different rules prevail when a suit is upon contract than those applicable in an action for a tort. If the cashier's act is the act of the bank, the liability of the latter for the tort may be plain, although it might not be liable for a promise by the cashier made under the same circumstances. Morse, Banks & Bkg. § 171; Thomp. Corp. §§ 4779, 6283. The cashier is the proper officer to receive deposits and to give certificates or vouchers in respect thereto. Morse, Banks & Bkg. § 161. If he knew, or assumed to know, the source from which the deposit arose, we see no reason why he might not include such a fact in his certificate, if the customer consented or the business of the bank would be thereby subserved. We quite agree with Judge Barr, who heard this case below on a demurrer, who, on this subject, said: "As the First National Bank had the right to accept the deposits of the insurance company, it would seem to follow, as an incident to receiving deposits, that the cashier might state, orally or in writing, to those authorized to inquire, the amount of the deposits and the nature of the deposits, whether on account of capital stock or surplus, or whether a general deposit. That far he was acting under the corporate powers and in the usual course of his business. He had also the corporate power, in the course of his business, to state more than what the books of the bank showed, if he personally knew the fact, or assumed to know the fact, in the performance of his official duties, as to the amount of the deposit or the character of the deposit. In the absence of any evidence, and assuming that the allegations of the bill are true, it may be presumed that thus far the fact stated by the cashier of the First National Bank in regard to the character of the deposit, whether it was capital stock or capital stock and surplus, was such as the books of the bank showed, or such as the cashier of the bank and the custodian of the deposits had a right to know and might communicate. So that, if he knew the deposit was made up by discounts credited with the intention of swelling the deposit, with a view to deceiving the insurance commissioner into believing that the capital stock was paid up, it would be within the bank's corporate powers. The liability in such a case would be because the false representations were made about a thing which was the bank's business in connection with its corporate powers, and in the usual course of the business of the cashier of the bank." 86 Fed. 1013, 1016.

The division into capital stock and surplus was equally within his competency to state to one entitled to inquire, though of no particular significance to the state insurance commissioner, whose duty was limited to inquiring and certifying that the company's capital "had been paid in and is possessed by it in money." Act 1870 (Gen. Stat. 1888, p. 66, § 7). The material thing to the commissioner was that this certificate, if true, established the conditions which entitled the company to begin business. The mere fact the company had to its credit an amount of money equal to its authorized capital would be an immaterial fact, unless it should also appear that that deposit constituted capital stock paid in and "possessed by it in money." This was, therefore, the material thing to which the cashier certified, and if this fact appeared from the books or deposit slips of the bank, or was otherwise known or supposed to be known to the cashier, he, as the custodian of the deposit and chief executive of the bank, was acting within the apparent scope of his duty and authority when he gave this statement. That it was sworn to does not affect its character as an act of the bank. It was the certificate of the bank's cashier, and so officially signed. It was sworn to by the gentleman who filled that office. The jurat was necessary for the purpose of the state insurance commissioner, and added weight to the representation, to whomsoever it may have been addressed. If the act itself was not so far beyond the general scope of the powers of a banking corporation as to carry notice to all of its ultra vires character, and the certificate was given, not for the personal purposes of the cashier, but in the general course of the bank's business, the bank would be liable in an action of tort as fully as if made by direction of the board of directors.

It is no answer to say that the bank did not authorize a false statement. That may be true. But, as observed by Mr. Justice Willes, in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank, L. R. 2 Exch. 259, it has "put the agent in his place to do that class of acts, and he must be answerable for the manner in which the agent has conducted himself in doing the business which it was the act of the master to place him in." In Washington Gaslight Co. v. Lansden, 172 U. S. 534, 544, 43 L. ed. 543, 548, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 296, 300, the Supreme Court said: "The result of the authorities is, as we think, that, in order to hold a corporation liable for the torts of any of its agents, the act in question must be performed in the course and within the scope of the agent's employment in the business of the principal. The corporation can be held responsible for acts which are not strictly within the corporate powers, but which were assumed to be performed for the corporation and by the corporate agents who were competent to employ the corporate powers actually exercised. There need be no written authority under seal, nor vote of the corporation constituting the agency or authorizing the act. But in the absence of evidence of this nature there must be evidence of some facts from which the authority of the agent to act upon or in relation to the subject-matter involved may be fairly and legitimately inferred by the court or jury. Salt Lake City v. Hollister, 118 U. S. 256, 260, 30 L. ed. 176, 177, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1055; Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Harris, 122 U. S. 597, 609, 30 L. ed. 1146, 1148, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1286; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 101, 109, 37 L. ed. 97, 102, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 261, 263, and cases cited at page 110, 147 U. S. 37 L. ed. 102, and page 264, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep."

The cases of Manufacturers' Bank v. Scofield, 39 Vt. 590, and Ellerbe v. National Exch. Bank, 109 Mo. 445, 472, 19 S. W. 241, are instances of corporate liability for misrepresentations made by an officer of the corporation. Mapes v. Second Nat. Bank, 80 Pa. 163, is not a case which meets our approval. In First Nat. Bank v. Marshall & I. Bank, 28 C. C. A. 42, 54 U. S. App. 510, 83 Fed. 725, we held that when a cashier, as a mere act of courtesy, answered an inquiry as to the financial standing of a customer, the bank would not be liable if the answer should prove false. But the reason of the decision, as stated in the opinion of Judge Clark, was that the cashier was not at the time acting in respect to some interest or business of the bank; his response being a mere voluntary statement "having no relation to any business transaction with the bank."

2. To what extent did the plaintiff have a right to rely upon the truth of the representations contained in the cashier's certificate? Some direct connection between the bank and the plaintiff in error in the communication of this certificate is essential to a recovery. If the statement was addressed to, and intended only to influence the action of, the state insurance commissioner in respect to the licensing of the insurance company, he cannot sustain a recovery, even though he and others may have been led into the purchase of the shares of the insurance company as a consequence of the action of the insurance commissioner in admitting the company to do business upon the representation of the bank's certificate. The plaintiff's action, in the aspect of it now under consideration, is for fraud and deceit, and such an action must be bottomed upon false representations made to him, and with intent that he should be influenced thereby. The plaintiff does not sufficiently connect himself with the misrepresentations by the bare fact that he bought stock in a company which was improperly admitted to do business upon representations addressed to the state commissioner. The injury in such case is too remote. In Bedford v. Bagshaw, 4 Hurlst. & N. 538, an action was sustained against certain promoters and managers of a company who had made false statements in respect to the capital of the company in order to secure its insertion in the official lists of the stock exchange. The plaintiff, knowing that the rules of the stock exchange admitted no stocks to its lists until two thirds of the shares had been paid up, bought on the exchange in reliance that the shares so bought had been paid up accordingly. This proving not to be the case, the plaintiff was suffered to recover, although the false representation had been made to the committee of the stock exchange, and not to the plaintiff directly. The decision was subsequently overruled in Peek v. Gurney, L. R. 6 H. L. 377, 397. Lord Chelmsford, in commenting on the decision, said: "The actions were brought upon the allegation of a false representation made to the plaintiff. But no representation at all was made which reached either his eyes or his ears. From his knowing the rules of the stock exchange, he assumed that a certain representation had been made, and acted upon it." In Peek v. Gurney a descriptive prospectus was put forth by the directors of a company, in reliance upon which the plaintiff bought shares on open market. It was held that the prospectus in its terms was not an invitation to the public ultimately to become holders of shares, but to join the company at once by becoming original allottees of shares, and that only those drawn in by the misrepresentations of the prospectus to become allottees could have a remedy in action for the deceit. In line with Peek v. Gurney is the case of Hunnewell v. Dunbury, 154 Mass. 236, 13 L. R. A. 733, 28 N. E. 267. The law of Massachusetts required the officers of a foreign corporation desiring to do business in the state to file with the commissioner of corporations a certificate showing its financial condition. The plaintiff gave credit upon the faith of the statements in such a certificate, which had been called to his attention by his own attorney. The Massachusetts court held that the action would not lie, saying: "To sustain such an action, misrepresentations must either have been made to the plaintiff individually, or as one of the public, or as one of a class to whom they are in fact addressed, or have been intended to influence his conduct in the particular of which he complains. This certificate was not communicated by the defendants or by the corporation to the public or to the plaintiff. It was filed with a state official for the definite purpose of complying with a requirement imposed as a condition precedent to the right of the corporation to act in Massachusetts. Its design was, not to procure credit among merchants, but to secure the right to transact business in the state. The terms of the statute carry no implication of such a liability."

That this certificate constituted a part of the files in the office of the state insurance commissioner, and that it was his duty, on demand, to furnish copies to any of the public, or that he might himself, as a state official, include such certificate in his own official publications, is not enough to show that the bank had any other design in giving it than to influence the action of the commissioner. The circumstance that it might thus come to the eye of persons disposed to deal in the company's shares, and thus induce them to buy, is only evidence to be looked at with other circumstances tending to show that the bank designed to influence the public at large or the plaintiff in particular to buy the company's shares. The Kentucky statute carries no implication of civil liability for a false statement, although it does make the giving of a false statement to the commissioner a criminal offense. The right of one of the public who has sustained a loss by the wrongful setting on foot of an insurance company whose capital has not been paid in, and of one who has bought shares or given credit to such a company in reliance upon the truth of representations made to the commissioner only for the purpose of inducing his action, must depend upon the general principles of law in respect of actions for false representations. It has never been a ground of action that the defendant made a dishonest representation, and that the plaintiff had relied upon it and sustained injury. The moral obligation to speak the truth is not ground for a civil action, unless the misrepresentation was intended to induce the very action by the plaintiff which has resulted in his damage. Cooley, Torts, p. 493; Wells v. Cook, 18 Ohio St. 67, 88 Am. Dec. 436; Barry v. Croskey, 2 Johns. & H. 1. However lamentable the eventual results of a dishonest representation to persons who in reliance thereon have come to grief, they cannot recoup such losses unless they are able in one way or another to bring themselves within the class of persons for whom the representation was intended.

But it was never meant to decide in Peek v. Gurney that a company's prospectus might not be broad enough to stand, not only as an invitation to original allottees, but to all others who might be disposed to deal in the company's shares. And so the 57 L. R. A.

case was explained in Andreus v. Mockford [1896] 1 Q. B. 372, where it was held that if the object of a prospectus is not only to induce applications for original allotments of shares, but also to induce persons to whom it was sent to purchase shares in the market, its function would not be exhausted when all the shares should be subscribed, and that the persons issuing the prospectus would be responsible for the injury sustained in reliance upon the truth of statements therein, known to be false, by any person to whom the paper was sent who should, in consequence, buy on the market. Scott v. Dixon, 29 L. J. Exch. N. S. 62, note, was approved in Peek v. Gurney. The case seems only to be reported in a note to Bedford v. Bagshaw, 4 Hurlst. & N. 538. As stated in the opinion of Lord Chelmsford, the action was for a misrepresentation made in a report by the directors to the shareholders of a banking company. Plaintiff was not a shareholder, and, in the absence of other circumstance, could not be regarded as addressed. But it was shown that copies of the report were left at the bank, and were to be had by brokers and all persons applying for them who desired information with a view to the purchase of shares, and that the plaintiffs, through their broker, purchased at the bank a copy of the report, and in reliance bought shares and sustained a loss; a material statement being false. There was a judgment for the plaintiffs. Lord Chelmsford said: "I do not doubt the propriety of this decision. The report, though originally made to the shareholders, was intended for the information of all persons who were disposed to deal in shares; and the representation must be regarded as having been made, not indirectly, but directly to each person who obtained the report from the bank, where it was publicly announced it was to be bought, in the same manner as if it had been personally delivered to him by the director."

The true inquiry is, Who did the bank design to influence by its false representation? If the representation here involved was not only made to induce favorable action by the state insurance commissioner, but was also intended for the information of all who should be disposed to deal in the company's shares, and who should inspect it for information in respect of the company's capital, it should be regarded as addressed to every such person. So, if the jury should find that the plaintiff was known to the bank as a person disposed to buy such shares, and was referred to this statement for information concerning its capital, they would be justified in finding that the representation was addressed to him personally. Such reference of the plaintiff to the certificate would be a repetition of the misrepresentation, addressed directly to him, and render it liable, irrespective of the original design and purpose with which the certificate was given.

3. Was the misrepresentation knowingly false? One who has been induced by false representations to buy property has open to him no less than three remedies. He may rescind and sue at law for the consideration, he may bring an equitable suit for rescission and obtain full relief, or he may retain what he has received and bring his action for fraud and deceit. The first two kinds of relief lie, as is most evident, only against the vendor. The third will lie against either the vendor or any third person through whose false representations, directly made, the plaintiff has sustained damages. Cook, Corp. § 354, and cases cited. Before the plaintiff can recover in an action of deceit, he must prove two things: that the representation was false, and that the person making it knew it was false. Glasier v. Rolls, L. R. 42 Ch. Div. 436; Derry v. Peek, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 337; Kountze v. Kennedy, 147 N. Y. 124, 29 L. R. A. 360, 41 N. E. 414; Cook, Corp. § 355; Trimble v. Reid, 97 Ky. 713, 31 S. W. 861. Such an action differs essentially from one brought for rescission of a contract on the ground of misrepresentation. In the latter kind of suit it is immaterial whether the representation was made dishonestly or not. If the contract was obtained by misrepresentation, however honestly made, it cannot stand. But, when the action is for fraud and deceit, it is not enough to show that the representation was untrue; for, if it was honestly believed to be true, that is a good defense. Derry v. Peek, cited above. But a representation recklessly made, without knowledge of its truth, could not be a statement honestly believed. Cooper v. Schlesinger, 111 U. S. 148, 28 L. ed. 382, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 360. "Fraud must concur with the false statement in order to give a ground of action." Evans v. Collins, 5 Q. B. 804, 820; Pasley v. Freeman, 3 T. R. 51, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 74. Lord Herschell, in Derry v. Peek, thus summed up the authorities: "First, in order to sustain an action of deceit, there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Secondly, fraud is proved when it is shown that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. Although I have treated the second and third as distinct cases, I think the third is but an instance of the second; for one who makes a statement under such circumstances can have no real belief in the truth of what he states. To prevent a false statement being fraudulent, there must, I think, always be an honest belief in its truth. And this probably covers the whole ground; for one who knowingly alleges that which is false has obviously no such honest belief. Thirdly, if fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial. It matters not that there was no intention to cheat or injure the person to whom the statement was made."

A representation in respect to a matter, with the intent to influence the conduct of another, implies necessarily the belief of the party making it that the statement is true. If the fact be one within his means of knowledge, and he have no knowledge of the fact, a jury would be authorized to believe that the statement was knowingly false. Kountze v. Kennedy, 147 N. Y. 124, 29 L. R. A. 360, 41 N. E. 414; Prewitt v. Trimble, 92 Ky. 176, 17 S. W. 356; Cole v. Cassidy, 138 Mass. 437, 52 Am. Rep. 284.

In respect to evidence tending to establish that the false representation was made knowingly, Lord Herschell, in Derry v. Peek, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 337, 375, expressed a view which meets with our hearty approval when he said: "At the same time I desire to say distinctly that, when a false statement has been made, the questions whether there were reasonable grounds for believing it, and what were the means of knowledge in the possession of the person making it, are most weighty matters for consideration. The ground upon which an alleged belief was founded is a most important test of its reality. I can conceive many cases where the fact that an alleged belief was destitute of all reasonable foundation would suffice of itself to convince the court that it was not really entertained, and that the representation was a fraudulent one. So, too, although means of knowledge are, as was pointed out by Lord Blackburn in Brownlie v. Campbell, L. R. 5 App. Cas. 925, a very different thing from knowledge, if I thought that a person making a false statement had shut his eyes to the facts, or purposely abstained from inquiring into them, I should hold that honest belief was absent, and that he was just as fraudulent as if he had knowingly stated that which was false."

In such an action it is not essential to show that any benefit was derived from the deceit. Endsley v. Johns, 120 Ill. 479, 60 Am. Rep. 572, 12 N. E. 247; Pasley v. Freeman, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. p. 66, 3 T. R. 51; New York Land Improv. Co. v. Chapman, 118 N. Y. 288, 23 N. E. 187. It need not be the sole inducement moving the plaintiff. Cook, Corp. § 355; Morgan v. Skiddy, 62 N. Y. 319. The plaintiff's action must, however, have been affected materially by the deceit. New York Land Improv. Co. v. Chapman, 118 N. Y. 288, 23 N. E. 187.

4. In respect of the defendant Sullivan, the vendor from whom plaintiff in error bought the shares in question, it is needless to say that, if he made false representations knowingly in respect of the capital of the insurance company to the plaintiff for the purpose of inducing him to buy shares in the company, he would be liable for the damages sustained, if the plaintiff acted in reliance on the truth of the statement. And this would be so whether the plaintiff bought shares from him or from another. Cook, Corp. § 355; Sigafus v. Porter, 28 C. C. A. 443, 51 U. S. App. 693, 84 Fed. 430; Hubbell v. Meys, 50 N. Y. 480.

5. Upon each of the questions we have considered there was some evidence upon which the plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury.

The judgment below must be reversed.

It is accordingly ordered that the cause be remanded for a new trial upon principles not inconsistent with this opinion.

(46 C. C. A. 132, 107 Fed. 41.)

1. The right to garnish a debtor is not limited to the situs of the chose in action; and a garnishment by a citizen of one state of a debtor of the same state, whose creditor resides, whose debt was contracted and is payable, in another state, is such an attachment of the chose in action as will authorize the court to obtain jurisdiction to dispose of it by publication of the summons against the defendant.
2. One who removes a case from a state to the Federal court is estopped from attacking the jurisdiction of the latter upon any ground except that the court from which it was removed had no jurisdiction.
3. One who instigates another to do a wrongful action, and, when the wrongdoer is sued, takes upon himself and conducts the defense of the case, is estopped from again litigating with the plaintiff in that action the issues there decided.
4. A defect of parties plaintiffs or defendants through misjoinder or nonjoinder is waived by a failure to suggest the same by demurrer or answer.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to hold defendants liable on a judgment which had been obtained against a marshal for wrongful attachment of property at the instance of defendants. Modified.

*Headnotes by SANBORN, Circuit Judge.

Statement by Sanborn, Circuit Judge:

Kate Tootle, W. W. Wheeler, Joshua Motter, and F. S. Dameron, the plaintiffs in error, are the surviving members of the co-partnership styled Tootle, Hosea, & Co., which in 1890 was composed of these plaintiffs in error and W. E. Hosea. Hosea died in 1893, and the plaintiffs in error continued the mercantile business of Tootle, Hosea, & Co., assumed their liabilities, and received their assets, as partners under the name of Tootle, Wheeler, & Motter. On January 10, 1890, Tootle Hosea, & Co. commenced an action against Thomas Lynch, and caused a writ of attachment to be issued against him and delivered to the United States marshal for the district of Kansas. R. L. Walker was at that time the marshal, and they gave him a bond of indemnity in the sum of $4,102, conditioned, among other things, that they would pay all damages to him which should result from his seizure under this writ of attachment of "certain merchandise situated in the storeroom now occupied by Coleman & Lynch, on Douglas avenue, Wichita, Kansas." The Coleman & Lynch referred to in this bond were R. R. Coleman and C. T. Lynch, the defendants in error in this action. Walker seized their goods under this writ of attachment, and disposed of them. Coleman & Lynch brought an action at law against him in one of the state courts of Kansas for his seizure and conversion of their goods. He delivered the summons served upon him to the attorneys for Tootle, Hosea, & Co., and they answered for him that the property which he seized was the property of Thomas Lynch, the defendant in the attachment suit, and that he had lawfully taken it under the writ in that action. This action resulted on December 4, 1895, in a judgment against Walker for $4,873.20 damages and $214.42 costs. H. C. Solomon, John W. Adams, and George W. Adams were the attorneys for Tootle, Hosea, & Co., who brought the attachment suit, and they continued to act for that firm until the plaintiffs in error succeeded them, and have since acted for the plaintiffs in error in all the litigation which has grown out of that attachment. They were hired and paid by Tootle, Hosea, & Co. and their successors to defend Walker in the action just mentioned, and Walker neither paid nor agreed to pay anything for their services. On October 28, 1897, the defendants in error, Coleman & Lynch, commenced the action now before us. They were residents and citizens of the state of Kansas, and the plaintiffs in error were residents and citizens of St. Joseph, in the state of Missouri. For the sake of brevity the plaintiffs in error will be called the "defendants," and the defendants in error the "plaintiffs," in speaking of this action. The defendants were conducting a mercantile business in St. Joseph under the name of Tootle, Wheeler, & Motter, and various parties resident in Kansas were indebted to them in various sums, payable at St. Joseph, for goods purchased of them in that city. Coleman & Lynch sued the defendants in a state court in the state of Kansas, and garnished their debtors residing in that state. These debtors answered in the garnishee proceedings that they were indebted to the defendants in amounts which in the aggregate exceeded the claim of Coleman & Lynch. No service of summons was made upon the defendants otherwise than by publication under the statutes of Kansas. On December 11, 1897, the defendants removed this action to the United States circuit court for the district of Kansas. They then appeared specially in that court, and moved to dismiss the action and to discharge the garnishees because the state court of Kansas had not acquired and could not acquire any jurisdiction over them by the garnishment of their debtors and the publication of the summons, and because the United States circuit court had acquired no jurisdiction. This motion was denied, and the defendants excepted.

For a cause of action the plaintiffs alleged in their original petition that the defendants had directed and caused R. L. Walker, the United States marshal, to seize and convert their property. They also averred that they had brought the action and recovered against Walker the judgment for this conversion which has been recited, and that the defendants had employed and paid the attorneys and conducted the defense of that action for Walker, and were the real parties in interest therein. On motion of the plaintiffs these averments regarding the trial of the action and the judgment against Walker were stricken from the petition, and thereupon the plaintiffs filed an amended petition in which they alleged that the defendants instigated and caused the conversion of their property, and sought to recover the value thereof. The defendants answered with a denial of every allegation of the amended petition, and an averment that the property in controversy belonged to Thomas Lynch, the defendant in the attachment suit, and that it was lawfully levied upon by Walker under the writ in that action. The plaintiffs replied that the issues tendered by the plea of justification had been tried in the action between them and Walker; that, while Walker was the nominal defendant, the defendants were the real defendants in that action; that they had given the bond of indemnity which induced Walker to make the levy; that they had employed and paid the lawyers who defended him in the action against him for conversion; that they were the real defendants in that suit; that judgment had been rendered against Walker therein; and that all the issues tendered by the plea of justification became res judicata between the plaintiffs and defendants by virtue of that judgment. The defendants moved to strike from the reply all allegations referring to the trial and judgment in the action against Walker. They demurred to the reply. They moved to dismiss the action. They objected to any evidence under the pleadings, to the introduction in evidence of the pleadings and judgment in Coleman & Lynch against Walker, and insisted in every way possible that the trial and judgment in that case were immaterial to any issue in this action. The court below denied their motions, overruled their demurrer, received the pleadings and judgment in the Walker case in evidence, and refused to permit the defendants to contradict the findings in that case relative to the ownership of the goods seized by Walker and their value. The plaintiffs introduced evidence, which was not contradicted, tending to show that Tootle, Hosea, & Co. gave the bond of indemnity to Walker before he seized the goods of the plaintiffs; that he was a mere nominal party to the action of Coleman & Lynch against him; that the defendants were the real parties in interest in that action; that they hired and paid the attorneys who acted for Walker, and really inspired and conducted the defense. At the close of the evidence the court below instructed the jury to return a verdict for the plaintiffs for the amount of the judgment against Walker, and interest at 6 per cent from the date of its entry. The defendants challenge this judgment by their writ of error.

Argued before Caldwell, Sanborn, and Thayer, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. John W. Adams, George W. Adams, and H. C. Solomon, for plaintiffs in error:

This case could not have been commenced in the United States circuit court in the second district of Kansas.

The special appearance of the plaintiffs in error to remove this case to the Federal court does not preclude them from objecting to the jurisdiction of the court.

The supreme court of the state of Kansas has never construed the statute providing for service by publication as applied to an action in garnishment, where the defendants were nonresidents of the state and no personal service was made upon them. The situs of a debt is at the place where it is payable, and if a debt is payable in another state wherein the creditor resides, and no personal service has been made in the state of Kansas upon the defendant, garnishment cannot be had.

A Federal court does not acquire jurisdiction of a suit removed from a state court by virtue of an attachment made in the state court, where there was no personal service of process on defendant, a resident of another state.

Perkins v. Hendryx, 40 Fed. 657.

The right of the defendant to insist upon the objection to the illegality of service was not waived by the special appearance of counsel for him to move the dismissal of the action on that ground, or, what we consider as intended, that the service be set aside, nor, when that motion was overruled, by their answering for him to the merits of the action.

time the plaintiffs in error were inhabitants and residents of Missouri, and neither one of them had ever seen said Walker or been in the state of Kansas. And though nonresidents, in the manner in which the suit was brought the petition failed to disclose that it involved questions arising under the laws of the United States. Hence plaintiffs in error would be precluded from removing said case to the Federal court, though this could have been done by Walker, had he been sued as marshal.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The first objection urged against the judgment in question is that the court below was without jurisdiction because the state court of Kansas, in which the action was commenced, could not obtain jurisdiction over the defendants, who were residents and citizens of Missouri, or over the choses in 57 L. R. A.

action owned by them, by means of garnishment of their debtors, who resided in Kansas, and by service of the summons upon the defendants by publication at the suit of the plaintiffs, who were also residents and citizens of Kansas. The statutes of that state in terms authorize such garnishments, and the application of the amounts due to the defendants from the garnishees to the satisfaction of the plaintiffs' demand, upon publication of the summons against the defendants. Kan. Gen. Stat. 1897, chap. 95, §§ 48, 72, 227, 228. The ground of the objection is that the situs of the choses in action attached by the garnishment was in St. Joseph, Missouri, where the debts were contracted and were payable, and where the creditors resided; and the argument is that these choses in action could not be attached where they were not located. This theory has received the sanction of the supreme court of Kansas in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Sharitt, 43 Kan. 375, 8 L. R. A. 385, 23 Pac. 430, and the condemnation of the Supreme Court of the United States in Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Sturm, 174 U. S. 710, 43 L. ed. 1144, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 797, in which the Kansas case is reviewed and disapproved. There is no essential difference between the facts of the case in hand and those which conditioned the latter decision, and it is not only decisive of the issues in this case, but is in accord with reason, with the great weight of authority, and with the general understanding and practice of the profession. It is true, generally speaking, that the situs of a chose in action is the residence of its owner,—the domicile of the creditor. But the power to prescribe the remedies by which a debt may be collected and disposed of is not limited to the domicile of its owner. The creditor must often resort to the residence of the debtor to recover the amount due him, and must avail himself of the remedies prescribed by the debtor's state for this purpose. In this state of the case it is competent, just, and common legislation for the state of the debtor to provide for the protection of its home creditors by statutes which enable them to prevent their debtors residing in another state from taking out of the state the money due them from their debtors within the state, and from compelling their creditors to follow them into another state to collect moneys they justly owe them, while the debts to the home creditors can be more conveniently and speedily satisfied out of the moneys due to their debtors from debtors residing in their own state. Administration, attachment, and garnishment laws are all of this character, and they have met general approbation. They do not rest upon the proposition that the situs of the chose in action is the domicile or the state of the debtor, but upon the fact that the debtor himself is there, and that his state governs his acts, and may lawfully so prescribe and control the remedies for the collection and transmission to his creditor of the money he owes that justice shall be done, not only to his creditor, but also to that creditor's creditor residing in the state of the debtor. They rest upon the fact that while the situs of the debt or of the personal property, for all the purposes of its ownership, is in the state of the creditor, yet the debtor has its control, its actual possession, and a legal notice to him places it in the custody of the law, and subject to the process of the court of the state in which he resides. This is solid ground. It is consonant with reason and with reality. It governs the administration of estates of deceased persons, concerning which Mr. Justice Gray, in Wyman v. Halstead, 109 U. S. 654, 658, sub nom. Wyman v. United States ex rel. Halstead, 27 L. ed. 1068, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 417, said: "The general rule of law is well settled that, for the purpose of founding administration, all simple-contract debts are assets at the domicile of the debtor." Wilkins v. Ellett, 9 Wall. 740, 19 L. ed. 586, 108 U. S. 256, 27 L. ed. 718, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 641. It lies at the foundation of the attachment and garnishment laws of the states, and sustains the action of the court below in this case. The origin of these laws is the custom of foreign attachment in the city of London. Under that custom the garnishee alone was summoned. The defendant received no notice, and at the conclusion of the proceedings the garnishee was required to pay his debt to the plaintiff, and was released from liability to the defendant. An attachment or garnishment is in the nature of a proceeding in rem. It proceeds upon the theory that the res is attached; that notice to the debtor or the party in control of the personal property places his obligation to pay or the property in his control at the disposition of the court. Such a notice attaches the debt,—the res; and, when this has been done, notice to the defendant which will give to the court ample jurisdiction to dispose of the thing attached may be given by publication, or by such other means as have been lawfully provided by statute, upon well-settled principles. Our conclusion is that the right to garnish a debtor is not limited to the situs of the chose in action, and a garnishment by a citizen of one state of a debtor of the same state, whose creditor resides, whose debt was contracted and is payable, in another state, is such an attachment of the chose in action as will authorize the court to obtain jurisdiction to dispose of it by publication of the summons against the defendant. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Sturm, 174 U. S. 710, 43 L. ed. 1144, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 797; Reimers v. Seitco Mfg. Co. 30 L. R. A. 364, 17 C. C. A. 223, 37 U. S. App. 426, 429, 70 Fed. 573, 574; Mooney v. Co. 50 Minn. 405, 407, 17 L. R. A. 84, 52 N. W. 905; Wyeth Hardware & Mfg. Co. v. 57 L. R. A.

H. F. Lang & Co. 127 Mo. 242, 246, 27 L. R. A. 651, 29 S. W. 1010; Howland v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 134 Mo. 474, 478, 36 S. W. 29.

The position of counsel for the defendants that, notwithstanding this rule of law, the state court had no jurisdiction of this case, because the supreme court of Kansas had decided in one case in 1890 that a court of that state could not obtain jurisdiction by the means here employed, while the decision of the Supreme Court in Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Sturm, 174 U. S. 710, 43 L. ed. 1144, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 797, had not been rendered when this action was commenced, in 1897, cannot be permitted to prevail, for two reasons: In the first place, the law was not changed by the erroneous decision of the supreme court of Kansas in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Sharitt, 43 Kan. 375, 8 L. R. A. 309, 23 Pac. 430, and the power had been granted and the duty imposed by the legislature of Kansas upon its courts to take jurisdiction of actions of this kind by service of garnishment and publication of summons in the manner adopted in this case. Under this settled rule of law, the state court had jurisdiction notwithstanding the mistake of the supreme court of Kansas. In the second place, a single decision of the highest court of a state is insufficient to establish an erroneous rule of construction of the statutes of that state, clearly disapproved by the Supreme Court of the United States and the great weight of authority throughout the country.

It follows from this conclusion, that the state court obtained sufficient jurisdiction of the subject of this action and of the defendants by the garnishment and the service of the summons upon the defendants by publication, to authorize the disposition of the moneys due from the garnishees by the judgment of the court; and the defendants are estopped by their removal of the cause from attacking the jurisdiction of the Federal court on any other ground. It does not lie in the mouth of one who has removed a cause from the state to the Federal court to claim that the latter has no jurisdiction of the case, except upon the ground that the court from which it was removed was without jurisdiction. Cowley v. Northern P. R. Co. 159 U. S. 569, 583, 40 L. ed. 263, 207, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 127; Purdy v. Wallace Muller & Co. 81 Fed. 513, 515.

The next question for consideration is the effect of the pleading and evidence of the judgment between the plaintiffs and R. L. Walker, who was the United States marshal whose deputy levied the writ upon the property of the plaintiffs. The defendants gave to Walker the bond of indemnity which induced him to seize this property. The plaintiffs sued him for the conversion of these goods. The defendants hired and paid the lawyers who conducted his defense. These were the same lawyers who brought the attachment suit, and who are protecting the defendants in the present case. In all this litigation they represented the defendants. While in the action against Walker they signed the pleadings and papers as his attorneys, they were in reality conducting these proceedings, defending the action, procuring evidence, cross-examining the witnesses of the plaintiffs, not only for Walker, but also for the real parties in interest,—the defendants who had indemnified him. The issues presented and tried in that case were whether the property seized by Walker belonged to the plaintiffs or to Thomas Lynch, the defendant in the attachment suit, and what the value of that property was when it was taken from the plaintiffs. The defendants, through their attorneys, conducted the trial of these issues in the action against Walker, and the jury found them in favor of the plaintiffs. While their names did not appear upon the record, they were the real defendants, the real parties in interest, and the parties who actually made and conducted the defense. The inevitable effect of these facts is that, in any suit between the plaintiffs and the defendants upon the same cause of action involved in the action against Walker, the issues concerning the title and the value of the property seized are res judicata, and cannot be again litigated. One who instigates another to do a wrongful act, and, when the wrongdoer is sued, takes upon himself and conducts the defense of the case, is estopped from again litigating with the plaintiff in that action the issues there decided. Lovejoy v. Murray, 3 Wall. 1, 18, 18 L. ed. 129, 134. The judgment against Walker was therefore a conclusive determination against the defendants of the issues whether or not the plaintiffs were the owners of the property seized, and of the value of that property.

But it is contended that in the pleading of this judgment and in its introduction in evidence many and fatal errors were committed. Let us first clearly understand the nature of this action, and then consider the soundness of this contention. This was not an action upon the judgment against Walker. It was an action for the same seizure and conversion of the property for which the judgment against Walker was rendered. But that judgment did not determine that these defendants were liable for or should pay the amount thereof. For this reason that judgment alone would not authorize the court to enter a judgment against the defendants. Other evidence was requisite to establish the proposition that they were liable for this conversion. It was necessary to try and determine issues which were not considered in the action against Walker, before the judgment against him would warrant a recovery against the defendants. Those issues were whether or not the defendants gave the bond of indemnity, and thereby instigated the taking and conversion, and whether or not they assumed and conducted the defense, and thus became the real defendants in the action against Walker. In other words, it was important to the plaintiffs' recovery here that they should establish four propositions: (1) That the defendants gave the bond of indemnity, and instigated Walker to take and convert the property; (2) that they assumed and conducted the defense to the action against him for the conversion; (3) that the property seized was their property; and (4) its value. The judgment against Walker was no evidence of the first two propositions, but it was conclusive evidence against the plaintiffs of the last two. Thus it will be seen that the cause of action could not be based upon the judgment, but that it was for the conversion, and that it was necessary to establish two propositions by evidence dehors the record in the Walker Case, while that judgment was conclusive evidence of the other two. We are now ready to consider the objections to the pleadings and the evidence of this judgment.

It is assigned as error that the trial court overruled the motion to strike from the reply that part which related to the judgment against Walker, and that it overruled a demurrer to the reply. There are two reasons why this judgment cannot be reversed on account of these rulings: The first is that the defendants pleaded new matter in their answer,—that the property seized was owned by Thomas Lynch, and was taken by Walker under the writ in the attachment suit against him,—and the averments in the reply concerning the judgment against Walker constituted a pertinent answer to this new matter, under the statutes of Kansas. Kan. Gen. Stat. 1897, p. 122, § 103. The argument that it was unnecessary for the defendants to plead this new matter, under the decision in Kerwood v. Ayres, 59 Kan. 343, 53 Pac. 134, in order to prove it, and that therefore the plaintiffs had no right to reply to it, is not persuasive. When the defendants unnecessarily pleaded this matter, they opened the door and invited the plaintiffs to reply to it. However, their remedy was not a motion to strike out part of the reply; it was not to pick the mote out of their brother's eye; but it was to take the beam out of their own, to cure their own fault, to withdraw the unnecessary new matter from their answer. This they did not do, and the motion to strike out this part of the reply was properly denied. The second reason is that the pleadings, proceedings, and judgment in the action against Walker were competent and conclusive evidence, between the parties, of the title to the property in controversy and its value; and if they were pleaded when they should not have been, the only effect of this error was to give the defendants notice of this evidence earlier than they would otherwise have received it. This notice could not have prejudiced them, and error without prejudice is no ground for reversal.

It is insisted that the ruling of the court in striking the plea of this judgment from the original petition rendered the question whether or not it could be properly pleaded in the reply res judicata. But the two questions are not the same, and a court is not estopped before the trial of a case from correcting any erroneous ruling it may have made in the settlement of the pleadings.

It is said that the admission into the reply of this plea of the judgment against Walker constituted a departure in pleading. But the cause of action remained the same,—the taking and conversion of the property; and the plea of the judgment was a mere plea of an estoppel of the defendants from denying the truth of the two facts—the title and the value of the property seized—whose existence was challenged by the new matter in the answer. There is no departure from a cause of action for conversion to a cause of action on the judgment.

It is insisted that the court below should have dismissed this action at the trial because it appeared from the pleadings that Walker and the defendants were joint tortfeasors, that the plaintiffs had elected to sue Walker separately, and that, having made that election, they could not maintain an action against the defendants jointly. This objection was that there was a defect of parties defendant. If there was any such defect, the defendants were required to present it by demurrer if it appeared on the face of the pleadings, and by answer if it did not. 2 Kan. Gen. Stat. 1897, chap. 95, §§ 89-91. The objection here under consideration appeared upon the face of the original petition. It was not suggested by demurrer or by answer, and was first presented by a motion to dismiss the action upon the opening of the trial. The defendants' silence, and their answer to the merits of the case without suggesting the defect, waived this objection. Their motion came too late, and it was rightly overruled.

It is insisted that the pleadings and judgment against Walker were not competent evidence of the title and value of the property, because that action was not brought against Walker as marshal, and because the evidence does not establish the fact that the plaintiffs knew that the defendants were conducting Walker's defense. But it is not the name, title, or capacity in or under which Walker was sued that conditions the estoppel of the defendants by the judgment against him. It is the fact that they instigated the taking, and assumed and conducted the defense of the action for the taking, of the property of the plaintiffs. It was their own acts which estopped them, and it was utterly immaterial under what name or title they performed these acts. It made no difference, therefore, whether Walker was sued for this taking, and the defendants defended him, as marshal, gentleman, yeoman, or man. They were equally estopped by their deeds.

Nor is the objection that this judgment can have no effect because the plaintiffs did not know that the defendants were defending Walker worthy of more serious consideration. H. C. Solomon, John W. Adams, and George W. Adams were the attorneys of Tootle, Hosea, & Co. and of the defendants. As such attorneys they brought the action against Lynch, and issued the writ of attachment. They defended Walker, and their names appear as his attorneys upon all the pleadings and papers of the defendant in that suit. It is the common, almost the universal, practice for plaintiffs who procure the levy of an attachment to defend the person who levies it, when he is attacked by third parties on account of his seizure of the property under the levy. We cannot be blind, and we cannot presume that the defendants were blind, to this fact. The names of the attorneys for the defendants upon the pleadings and papers of Walker raised a clear presumption that the defendants were conducting his defense, and, in the absence of contradicting evidence, this was sufficient evidence to warrant the conclusion that the plaintiffs were aware of this fact.

It is specified as error that one of the witnesses for the plaintiffs was permitted to testify that he handed to Solomon the bond of indemnity in the attachment suit in the presence of Wheeler, one of the defendants, and Solomon said: "I wrote that myself, and signed the name of Tootle, Hosea, & Co. to it. We were not required to do anything further towards it." But this was certainly competent evidence against Wheeler, and Wheeler was a member of the co-partnership composed of the defendants in this suit. He saw the bond, heard the testimony of his attorney, and silently admitted its truth.

It is contended that the court erroneously admitted a part of a letter written by H. C. Solomon, one of the attorneys of the defendants, on September 4, 1890, to R. L. Walker, in which he wrote that his clients were paying all the costs of the litigation growing out of the attachment suit against Lynch. But the testimony of one of the defendants was that he left the entire charge and control of this matter to his attorneys, and the evidence was conclusive and uncontradicted that this letter was written by Mr. Solomon, one of these attorneys, and that the portion of it which was not produced could not be found after diligent search. In this state of the case, it was a competent admission of the defendants that they were paying the expense of conducting the defense of Walker, as well as of the other litigation growing out of the seizure of the property of the plaintiffs.

After the plaintiffs had introduced in evidence the pleadings and judgment against Walker, and had produced evidence tending to show that the defendants gave the bond of indemnity to him before the writ was levied upon the property of the plaintiffs, and that they had assumed and conducted his defense of the plaintiffs' action against him, the court refused to permit the defendants to introduce evidence that the defendant in the attachment suit was the owner of the property, and directed the jury to return a verdict for the plaintiffs for the amount of the judgment against Walker, and interest from the date of its entry. It is contended that these rulings were erroneous because the defendants were entitled to contest the title to the property in issue, because the evidence was insufficient to warrant the instruction, and because interest should have been allowed upon the value of the property, and not upon the amount of the judgment against Walker. There was no error in the exclusion of the evidence offered by the defendants, because the judgment against Walker rendered the title to the property res judicata as against them. The evidence was uncontradicted and conclusive that the defendants assumed and conducted Walker's defense, and that they gave him the bond of indemnity before he seized the property. But this was an action for damages for the taking and conversion of the property. It was not an action upon the judgment against Walker, and for that reason interest should not have been computed upon the judgment, but upon the value of the property converted. This error made the judgment $232.44 more than it should have been.

The judgment of the court below is accordingly affirmed to the amount of $5,870.56, but it is not affirmed as to the remaining $232.44, or any part thereof. It is modified as to this amount, and the case is remanded to the court below, with directions to so modify its judgment of March 16, 1900, that it shall stand for the amount of $5,870.56, instead of for the sum of $6,103. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Estill, 147 U. S. 591, 622, 37 L. ed. 292, 306, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 444.

Petition for writ of Certiorari denied by Supreme Court of United States October 21, 1901.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

City of CHICAGO, Appt.,

v.

(195 Ill. 19.)

An ordinance providing for the construction of a cement sidewalk 20 feet wide on each side of a street, at the expense of the abutting property, is not unreasonable, where the locality is one of residence and business, the property is worth from $150 to $300 per front foot, and the existing walks, varying from 6 to 20 feet in width, are in bad condition.

(February 21, 1902.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Cook County Court sustaining objections to the confirmation of assessments for the construction of sidewalks. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles M. Walker and Robert Redfield, for appellant:

It requires a clear and strong case to justify a court in holding that an ordinance passed by a municipality apparently acting within the scope of its authority is unreasonable, unjust, oppressive, and therefore void.

Warren v. Chicago, 118 Ill. 329, 9 N. E. 883; English v. Danville, 150 Ill. 92, 36 N. E. 994; Hawes v. Chicago, 158 Ill. 653, 30 L. R. A. 225, 42 N. E. 373.

The presumption is always in favor of the validity of a statute or of an ordinance passed in pursuance of a competent legal authority.

Harmon v. Chicago, 140 Ill. 375, 29 N. E. 732.

In the passage of an ordinance providing for a local improvement, the city council is clothed with power to determine what local improvement is required, its nature and character, when it shall be made, and the manner of its construction.

English v. Danville, 150 Ill. 92, 36 N. E. 994; Vane v. Evanston, 150 Ill. 616, 37 N. E. 901; Fagan v. Chicago, 84 Ill. 227; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 58, 94, and authorities cited.

Messrs. Mason & Noyes, for appellees:

The court had ample power to change, alter, and annul the assessment as justice required.

Act 1897, §§ 47, 52.

If, from all the surrounding circumstances, the court deems the ordinance unreasonable and oppressive, it may sustain the objections and dismiss the proceedings.

Ricks, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order of the county court of Cook county sustaining objections of appellees to the confirmation of a special assessment to pay the cost of constructing a cement sidewalk in front of appellees' properties on certain portions of Cottage Grove avenue, between Forty-Seventh and Fifty-First streets, in the city of Chicago. Appellees objected on the ground that the ordinance, so far as it affected the property objected for, was unreasonable, unjust, burdensome, and therefore void. The court found the issues for the objectors, and from this holding the appeal was prosecuted.

The ordinance in question was passed on the 14th day of May, 1900, under the provisions of the act of June 14, 1897 (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1899, chap. 24, p. 362), and no complaint is made that there was any irregularity in the passage of the ordinance, the sole and only question presented being whether the ordinance is unreasonable. It provides for the construction of a 20-foot cement walk on each side of Cottage Grove avenue, from the south curb line of Forty-Seventh street to the north curb line of Fifty-First street. The basis of the complaint against the ordinance is that appellees had sufficient walks in front of their premises, and that a walk such as this ordinance provides for is unnecessary, and that the requirement to build it is, under the circumstances, unreasonable. The total length of the improvement, counting both sides of the street, is about 1 mile. The street is 100 feet wide, the roadway 60 feet wide, and 20 feet from the curb line on each side to the lot line. The locality of the improvement is in the vicinity of Washington park, Fifty-First street, the south end of the improvement district forming the north line of said park. It is one block west of Drexel boulevard, one of the most important and desirable streets on the south side in said city. The evidence shows that the general character of the walks, outside of the cement walks, is that they are built of plank; walks varying in width from 6 to 20 feet; uneven as to grade, and in a generally dilapidated and worn condition. The property along the line of the proposed walk becomes more valuable as it extends south from Forty-Seventh street and to Washington park, varying, according to the improvements surrounding each particular locality, from $150 to $300 per front foot, exclusive of the improvements. Between Forty-Seventh and Forty-Eighth streets, on the west side, are one or two buildings in the middle of the block and one on the southeast corner of the block. On the east side, beginning at Forty-Seventh street, are buildings for 100 feet extending south. Between Forty-Eighth and Forty-Ninth streets, on the east side, is vacant; on the west side there are buildings; and between Fiftieth and Fifty-First streets, on the east side, there are three or four flat buildings and stores. The west side of the street, between Fiftieth and Fifty-First streets, is well built up to within 75 feet of Fiftieth street, there being but 75 feet of vacant ground in that block on the west side. The buildings are flat buildings, store buildings, saloons, and summer gardens. The buildings in value vary from $5,000 to $50,000 each. The property of one set of objectors, owners of lot 4, Cormack's subdivision, had a 20-foot plank walk that was built some seven or eight years ago; had been a number of times repaired; stringers were rotten, boards decayed and broken at the ends, and a number of holes in the walk; and the testimony showed that it would cost from 25 to 50 per cent of the value of the walk to put it in proper condition. The walk is 132 feet long. The property of the other objector, Wilson, being lot 1 and part of lot 2, Lafin's sublots 1 and 2, is improved property, with a frontage of 72 feet, and has in front of it a 14-foot plank walk, the age of which it is hard to ascertain from the testimony, but is old, and its condition was shown to be very bad. It had been a number of times repaired and improved, and the 57 L. R. A.

evidence showed that it would cost from 25 to 50 per cent to put it in fair and safe condition. The evidence further showed that after the passage of this ordinance, and pending this proceeding, the objector had a number of stringers put in and a number of planks put down, using about 150 feet of lumber; but still, with these improvements, the evidence clearly demonstrates that this walk was an unsafe and unfit walk for a city, and that it was 4 or 5 inches lower than the cement walk to which it joined. The property of this objector is improved, having upon it a four-story building of the value of $30,000 to $40,000. The assessment on this property was $290.80, and upon lot 4, above, $516.92. The evidence further showed that a great many of the owners of lots, under the notice to them from the city, built the walk as required, so that one third of it was completed at the hearing.

The insistence of appellant is that, taking the character and location of this street and the properties along it, the improvement was one in keeping therewith, and that, as to the particular objectors, their walks were in such condition that it was necessary that they be replaced with other and safe walks, and that to attempt to repair them would not only be at unreasonable cost, and still have unsuitable walks, but, in addition thereto, would conflict with an ordinance of the city establishing what was termed the "stone district." This latter ordinance defines a large amount of territory, and requires that all walks therein shall be made or rebuilt of stone or other incombustible material, and that no wood walks in that territory which should become worn should be relaid or repaired where the cost of the necessary repairs would exceed 10 per cent of the original cost of such wood walks. Appellees insist that this latter ordinance cannot control, because the territory defined as "stone district" has a broken line. We have examined the ordinance, and, in so far as it would affect this property, think that it sufficiently shows it to be within the stone district. We do not, however, regard that as controlling, as, if the ordinance for the improvement in question is so unreasonable as to render it void, the ordinance creating the stone district could not aid it.

Appellees, in stating their position with reference to this ordinance, say: "If, from all the surrounding circumstances, the court deems the ordinance unreasonable and oppressive, it may sustain objections and dismiss the proceedings." In support of this position appellees cite Hawes v. Chicago, 158 Ill. 653, 30 L. R. A. 225, 42 N. E. 373. In that case, on page 659, 158 Ill., page 227, 30 L. R. A., and page 375, 42 N. E., it is said: "The rule is that it requires a clear and strong case to justify a court in annulling the action of a municipal corporation acting within the apparent scope of its authority." Appellees also cite other cases, which are not, as we regard them, in point, and arose upon an entirely different state of facts. The Hawes Case, 158 Ill. 653, 30 L. R. A. 225, 42 N. E. 373, relied upon by appellees, was, as it seems to us, a strong appeal for the application of the rule of unreasonableness. There the objector owned a 20-acre tract with a frontage of 1,266 feet on the street being improved, and was required to build a cement sidewalk, and his assessment was $1,638.75. The property was used for a hay field, and did not have a building of any sort upon it. Five months prior to the passage of the ordinance requiring the construction of the cement sidewalk the owner of the property, in compliance with a prior ordinance, had constructed and put down, in the same place that the cement walk was to be, a 6-foot wood walk, which at the time of the ordinance there objected to was practically new, and as near in perfect order as a walk five months old could be. It further appeared in that case that the streets upon which it was to be built had never been improved, curbed, graded, or sewered, and the ordinance requiring the cement walk was, under such circumstances, held unreasonable and void. It must be borne in mind that in the passage of ordinances providing for local improvements it is the peculiar province of the city council to determine the necessity and character of the improvement and the manner of its construction (English v. Danville, 150 Ill. 92, 36 N. E. 994; Vane v. Evanston, 150 Ill. 616, 37 N. E. 901; Fagan v. Chicago, 84 Ill. 227); and we must also keep before us the presumption that always exists in favor of the validity of a statute or of an ordinance passed in pursuance of competent legal authority (Harmon v. Chicago, 140 Ill. 374, 29 N. E. 732). The question of the construction of walks and that class of improvements is expressly committed to the city council, and it may determine the extent and character of improvement required upon any given street, and include the same in one ordinance as one improvement, and under this rule may require walks to be built upon both sides of the same street by the same ordinance. Watson v. Chicago, 115 Ill. 78, 3 N. E. 430. In fact, it hardly seems necessary to extend any consideration of this question, as it is not contended by appellees that the city did not have power to pass an ordinance for an improvement of the street in question by building walks on both sides, but the insistence is that the particular ordinance that was passed is unreasonable in that it requires the objectors to build a walk where no walk was necessary, or under such circumstances as that the building of the walk by special assessment imposed upon the objectors such an unjust and unnecessary burden as to render the ordinance unreasonable. We do not think this contention is supported by the facts in this case. In Walker v. Morgan Park, 175 Ill. 570, 51 N. E. 636, we had under consideration an ordinance providing for the building of one sidewalk 2,475 feet in length, of which the objector owned 1,950 feet on one side of his premises, and of another sidewalk upon another side of the same premises 1,850 feet in length, of which the objector owned 1,150 feet, and that the cost to him of this walk would be $682 if done by the objector and $1,178 if done by the village. It was there averred that there were no improvements of any character on the property owned by the objector, but that there were a few scattering buildings upon occasional lots, owned by other persons, along the line of the proposed improvement, and that the only benefit to be derived from the walk was to enable people to go to a certain railroad station; and it was there contended that under that state of facts the ordinance providing for the walk was an unreasonable one, and for that reason void. Of that contention it was said (p. 573, 175 Ill., and p. 637, 51 N. E.): "From the allegations of the bill it is apparent that the real ground relied upon to defeat the ordinance providing for the construction of the sidewalk is that the locality where the sidewalk is ordered constructed is so thinly settled that there is no necessity whatever for the construction of a sidewalk,—that no sidewalk was needed where it was ordered to be laid. What the public necessities were was a question solely for the determination of the president and board of trustees of the village of Morgan Park; and when the incorporation clothed with power has acted in strict conformity to the statute conferring the power, as was the case here, its decision must be held final and conclusive, unless it is apparent that the action of the municipality is unreasonable, unjust, and oppressive, as held in Hawes v. Chicago, 158 Ill. 653, 30 L. R. A. 225, 42 N. E. 373. It may be that there was no pressing demand for the sidewalk in question, and that it would in the end have been better had its construction been postponed until the population of the village had increased; but that was a matter for the board of trustees to settle for themselves." And in that case the Hawes Case was distinguished. Field v. Western Springs, 181 Ill. 186, 54 N. E. 929, was also a case where the unreasonableness of the ordinance was relied upon. That was a case for the construction of cement sidewalks upon certain blocks in said village, wherein it was alleged and contended that the streets along which the walks were to be laid existed in name only, and had never been laid out; that they were unpaved, uncurbed, ungraded, and but little-used dirt roadways, overgrown with grass and weeds, and that there were no conditions requiring, at that time, the building of such walks. In speaking of the powers of the city it is there said (p. 191, 181 Ill., and p. 931, 54 N. E.): "The question of the necessity of a local improvement is by the law committed to the city council, and courts have no right to interfere to prevent such improvement, except in cases where it clearly appears that such discretion has been abused. The ground on which courts interfere is that the ordinance is so unreasonable as to render it void."

The case at bar seems to us to be much stronger than either of the latter cases. The district where this improvement is to be made is, as shown by the evidence, both a residence and business locality, and within one block of one of the finest and most desirable residence portions of the city of Chicago. The walks existing at the time of the passage of the ordinance were as diversified in form of construction, width, material, and condition as could well be in the distance covered by the improvement, running, as the evidence showed, from 6 feet in width to 20 feet,—which latter was the width designed for all the walks of that district, as established by the curb shown to have been already placed on each side. They were uneven, many of them old, and especially those of the objectors were both old, out of repair, and unsafe. The fact that objector Wilson, after the passage of the ordinance, caused considerable repairs to be placed on the walk in front of his premises, instead of being an argument against the reasonableness of this ordinance, seems to us to be an admission of the reasonableness of it. In fact, the one who made the repairs, by the mere statement of the character of them, showed that the walk was both unsafe and unfit for a place of such prominence.

We think that the court was not warranted in holding this ordinance void for unreasonableness, and its judgment is accordingly reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceeding not inconsistent with the views here expressed.

Rehearing denied.

City of MADISONVILLE, Appt.,

v.

M. W. BISHOP.

(.....Ky.....)

An unorganized assemblage of merry-makers to the number of 1,000 in the main street of a city, exploding fireworks, obstructing the use of the street, and endangering life and property, is a "riotous or tumultuous assemblage of people," within the meaning of a statute making the municipality liable for injuries done by such an assemblage.

(March 19, 1902.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hopkins County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injury to property alleged to have been caused by a mob. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Worthington, Pratt & Waddill, for appellant:

The reason for and purpose of the enactment, the title of the act, the subsequent legislation, its history, letter, and spirit, and even the side references and section titles, conclusively show that it never was contemplated that this statute dealing with mobs, riotous, tumultuous, frenzied, excited, inflamed assemblages, requiring the force of the city to suppress, should be construed to refer to an unorganized crowd of happy, jolly citizens making merry by shooting crackers for the sake of good Old Kris.

Messrs. John Fleming Gordon and William L. Gordon, with Mr. Maurice Kirby Gordon, for appellee:

The petition of appellee as plaintiff below states a cause of action in his favor, at common law, and it was error for the lower court to sustain the demurrer as to it.

Inasmuch as the court overruled the demurrer to the second paragraph, which distinctly states a cause of action under the statute, and correctly rendered judgment thereon for plaintiff (appellee), he is content to ask an affirmation of that judgment.

Hobson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee, M. W. Bishop, is a merchant in the city of Madisonville. He filed this suit to recover for the destruction of a costly plate glass window in his store. He alleged in his petition these facts: On Saturday night, December 23, 1899, the city caused and permitted a nuisance in the street in front of his store by suffering a riotous and tumultuous assembly of about 1,000 persons, unorganized, assembled for the purpose of violating the laws of the state as well as the city, and actually violating them by obstructing the street, rendering the use of it by the traveling public precarious, unpleasant, and dangerous, by discharging large quantities of fireworks, torpedoes, bombs, skyrockets, Roman candles, and other missiles loaded with powerful explosives, at and near the plaintiff's buildings situated on one of the principal business streets of the city, and in the heart thereof, where the buildings are close together and contain valuable merchandise displayed in expensive plate glass windows; that the mob or unlawful assemblage, without plaintiff's fault, exploded and fired their fireworks at plaintiff's building and at the plate glass windows in it; that it was formed and commenced firing about 5 o'clock in the evening, and continued all night; that the damage to his house occurred about 9 o'clock, after the shooting had been continued over four hours, and after other property in the neighborhood had been destroyed by the same assemblage of persons, with the knowledge of the officers of the city, who knew of the damage it was doing and was likely to do to the property of the citizens, but refused to take any steps to check the nuisance endangering life and property; that they had the power and ability of themselves and with the power of the citizens of the city to prevent the damage, and had notice and good reason to believe, and in fact did believe, that the tumultuous assemblage was about to take place, and were present among the assembly, and saw and heard what was going on in ample time to prevent it from doing injury; but that they refused to allay or suppress the tumult or mob, and by reason thereof his property was destroyed. The defendant demurred to the petition. Its demurrer was overruled, and it elected to stand by its demurrer, and, declining to plead to the petition, judgment was entered against it, and from this judgment it appeals.

The action is brought under section 8, Ky. Stat.: "If within any city, any church, convent, chapel, dwelling house or house used or designed for the transaction of lawful business, or ship, or shipyard, boat, or vessel, or railroad, or property of any kind belonging to any street or other railroad company, or any article of personal property, shall be injured or destroyed, or if any property therein or thereon shall be taken away or injured by any riotous or tumultuous assemblage of people, the full amount of damages so done shall be recoverable by the person injured, by action against the city, if the authorities thereof have the ability of themselves or with the aid of their own citizens to prevent such damage; but no such liability shall be incurred by such city unless the authorities thereof shall have had notice or good reason to believe that such riot or tumultuous assemblage was about to take place, or, having taken place, shall have had notice of the same in time to prevent said injury or destruction, either by their own force or by the aid of the citizens of such city. No person shall maintain such action who shall have unlawfully contributed by word or deed toward exciting or inflaming such tumult or riot, or who shall have failed to do what he reasonably could toward preventing, allaying, or suppressing it."

It is insisted for the city that the words "any riotous or tumultuous assemblage of people" refer only to an unlawful assemblage bent on evil, such as a mob, and that it was not contemplated that it should apply to a crowd of merrymakers celebrating the advent of Christmas. The purpose of the assembly, or the aim that it had primarily in view, is not material, if it was in fact riotous or tumultuous, and the city authorities had notice of it and ability to prevent the damage it did. The word "tumultuous" is thus defined: "Conducted with disorder; noisy, confused, boisterous, disorderly, as a tumultuous assembly or meeting." "Riotous" is defined thus: "Partaking of the nature of an unlawful assembly or its acts; seditious, tumultuous." Webster. Under these definitions an assemblage of 1,000 people in the main street of a city, obstructing the use of the street, and discharging bombs, skyrockets, Roman candles, and other missiles loaded with powerful explosives, at private property, endangering life and preventing the use of the street for the purposes of business, must certainly be held a riotous or tumultuous assembly. In Jolly v. Harrosville, 89 Ky. 280, 12 S. W. 313, the intestate had been killed in a celebration of this kind, and the suit was brought against the city for his death. The court, after showing that the city was not liable aside from the statute above quoted, said: "But the care and particularity with which the conditions of such liability are set out in the statute, and the restriction of it in express terms to cases of injury to property, shows the legislature did not intend to thereby authorize a recovery against a city for personal injury resulting from the malfeasance or negligence of police officers." The action before us is for an injury to property. The purpose of the statute is to secure the property of the citizen from loss by these disorderly assemblages which the city has reason to believe will do damage, and may be suppressed by it. Such statutes have been passed in many of the states, and are upheld. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 959. The statute should be liberally construed, with a view to promote its purposes. Ky. Stat. § 460. Its aim is the protection of private property against injury by disorderly gatherings of persons, and to require the city to exercise its police power to this end. One of the objects of municipal government is the better security of life and property where the population is crowded. It is known that the police do not always suppress disorderly persons, and the purpose of the statute is to put a check upon tumultuous assemblages of people in the cities, and induce greater vigilance on the part of the police in the maintenance of quiet and good order as well as the proper transaction of business. In State v. Brown, 69 Ind. 95, 35 Am. Rep. 210, under a statute making it a misdemeanor for three or more persons to "act in a violent and tumultuous manner," it was held that a party who went out to charivari a newly-married couple with clubs, bells, trumpets, tin pans, cannon, and other weapons, making a great tumult and disturbance, might be convicted. Judgment affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

v.

Addie L. LAKIN, Admr., etc., of James A. Lakin, Deceased.

(.....Mass.....)

1. The owner of walls left standing after the destruction of the building by fire is under no obligation to adjoining property owners to remove or protect the walls, until he has had a reasonable time to make necessary investigation and take such precautions as are required.
2. The owner of walls left standing by a fire, which cannot be used for rebuilding, owes adjoining owners the duty, after a reasonable time for investigation, to exercise such care in the maintenance of walls likely to fall on their property as will absolutely prevent injuries except from causes over which he would have no control, such as vis major, acts of public enemies, or wrongful acts of third persons which human foresight could not reasonably be expected to anticipate and prevent.
3. A new trial will not be granted for permitting the jury to allow interest upon the amount allowed for injury to property from falling walls from the time of the injury, instead of instructing them to put the plaintiff in as good a position as if the damages had been paid at the time of the injury, in the absence of anything to show that defendant was injured thereby.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Hampden County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for injuries to property caused by the fall of a wall which defendant's intestate was alleged to have negligently permitted to remain standing in a dangerous condition, which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Robert A. Allyn, S. S. Taft, and Arthur S. Kneil, for defendant:

The plaintiff did not exercise due care, and therefore is precluded from recovery.

If one has reasonable cause to apprehend injury to his property, and has sufficient time and opportunity to remove or secure the same, and fails to do so, he is guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover for such injury.

Spear*, 44 Mich. 169, 38 Am. Rep. 242, 6 N. W. 202; Krum v. Anthony, 115 Pa. 431, 8 Atl. 598; Washburn v. Tracy, 2 D. Chip. (Vt.) 128, 15 Am. Dec. 661; *Snyder v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. The defendant's intestate was not bound to exercise towards the plaintiff such a high degree of care as was required by the charge of the court.

The rule of Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 330, is that he who (a) brings on his land and keeps there anything (b) likely to do mischief if it escapes, must keep it at his peril (want of negligence being no excuse for its bringing or escape), subject, among other exceptions not important to this consideration to these: (c) When the bringing or escape come from a natural user of the land; (d) when the thing brought or escaping is something in which plaintiff has an interest or which is brought on the land for his benefit; and (e) when the existence and dangerous character of the thing brought or escaping is not known to defendant, either actually or impliedly; and (f) when he has no legal or actual control over it sufficient to prevent its escape. The culpable defendant is the one who brings "for his own purposes." The voluntary and positive characteristics of the act seem to be necessarily involved in a bringing "for a purpose."

A thing "apt to do mischief if it escapes" is regarded by the authorities as one necessarily having in itself escaping tendencies.

The erection of such a wall as this, if it had remained in normal condition, was a natural use of land, and so entirely outside of the rule.

To hold that the bare erection of such a wall is within the rule is to impede artificial progress and hinder industrial enterprise.

Another exception to the rule is where the thing on the land is maintained for the common benefit of plaintiff and defendant.

Knowledge of the dangerous condition of the thing is indispensable under the rule.

Messrs. J. B. Carroll and W. H. McClintock, for plaintiff:

There was evidence that the gale during which the walls fell was not of greater force than had been frequently experienced in Westfield before that time; and so the destruction of the plaintiff's property cannot be considered as having been caused by vis major.

It cannot be said, as matter of law, that the danger of the walls' falling was so obvious that the plaintiff was not in the exercise of due care in not moving his stock out of the building, especially when he probably could not obtain a suitable location for his business.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant's intestate was the owner of the land and of the first two stories of the building which stood upon it before the fire. The third story had been conveyed by the former owners to Lewis, Noble, and Lafflin, trustees, to hold during the life of the building. By the fire the life of the building was destroyed, and the ownership of Lewis and others in the third story was terminated. Ainsworth v. Mt. Moriah Lodge, A. F. & A. M. 172 Mass. 257, 52 N. E. 81. The defendant's intestate was left with his land and the walls and some other parts of the first and second stories standing upon it, and with the walls of the third story, which had previously belonged to the trustees, resting on the structure below, and connected with it as part of the realty. All rights of other persons in the walls of the third story had come to an end. As owner of the land and of the first and second stories of the building, he was owner of everything upon it which was a part of the real estate. Stockwell v. Hunter, 11 Met. 448, 45 Am. Dec. 220; Shavmut Nat. Bank v. Boston, 118 Mass. 125. His position in reference to the walls of the third story was like that of a landlord whose tenant leaves the leased land at the end of the term with structures that he has erected upon it, which have become a part of the realty. These structures which are abandoned by 57 L. R. A.

the tenant immediately become the property of the landlord to whose land they are affixed. Burk v. Hollis, 98 Mass. 55; Madigan v. McCarthy, 108 Mass. 376, 11 Am. Rep. 371; Watriss v. First Nat. Bank, 124 Mass. 571, 26 Am. Rep. 694; McIver v. Estabrook, 134 Mass. 550. As owner of the land and the structures upon it, which were subject to the power of gravitation, and likely to do injury to others if they fell, the defendant's intestate owed certain duties to adjacent landowners. His duty immediately after the fire was affected by the fact that until then he had had no ownership or control of the upper part of the wall, and that the condition of the whole had been greatly changed by the effect of the fire and the destruction of the connected parts. For dangers growing out of changes which he could not prevent he was not immediately liable. Gray v. Boston Gaslight Co. 114 Mass. 149, 19 Am. Rep. 324; Mahoney v. Libbey, 123 Mass. 20, 25 Am. Rep. 6. The jury were therefore rightly instructed that, before a liability could grow up against the defendant's intestate after the fire, he was entitled to a reasonable time to make necessary investigation and to take such precautions as were required to prevent the wall from doing harm.

We come next to the question, "What was his duty and what was his liability after the lapse of such a reasonable time?" There is a class of cases in which it is held that one who, for his own purposes, brings upon his land noxious substances or other things which have a tendency to escape and do great damage, is bound at his peril to confine them and keep them on his own premises. This rule is rightly applicable only to such unusual and extraordinary uses of property in reference to the benefits to be derived from the use and the dangers or losses to which others are exposed as should not be permitted except at the sole risk of the user. The standard of duty established by the courts in these cases is that every owner shall refrain from these unwarrantable and extremely dangerous uses of property, unless he provides safeguards whose perfection he guarantees. The case of Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 330, L. R. 1 Exch. 207, rests upon this principle. In this commonwealth the rule has been applied to the keeping of manure in a vault very near the well and the cellar of a dwelling house of an adjacent owner. Ball v. Nye, 99 Mass. 582, 97 Am. Dec. 56. See also Fitzpatrick v. Welch, 174 Mass. 486, 48 L. R. A. 278, 55 N. E. 178. That there are uses of property not forbidden by law to which this doctrine properly may be applied is almost universally acknowledged. This rule is not applicable to the construction and maintenance of the walls of an ordinary building near the land of an adjacent owner. In Quinn v. Crimmings, 171 Mass. 255, 258, 42 L. R. A. 101, 103, 50 N. E. 624, 626, Mr. Justice Holmes shows that, in reference to the danger from the falling of a structure erected on land, "the decision as to what precautions are proper, naturally may vary with the nature of the particular structure." He says: "As it is desirable that buildings and fences should be put up, the law of this commonwealth does not throw the risk of that act, any more than that of other necessary conduct, upon the actor, or make every owner of a structure insure against all that may happen, however little to be foreseen." The principle applicable to the erection of common buildings whose fall might do damage to persons or property on the adjacent premises holds owners to a less strict duty. This principle is that, where a certain lawful use of property will bring to pass wrongful consequences from the condition in which the property is put, if these are not guarded against, an owner who makes such a use is bound at his peril to see that proper care is taken in every particular to prevent the wrong. Woodman v. Metropolitan R. Co. 149 Mass. 335, 4 L. R. A. 213, 21 N. E. 482, and cases cited; Curtis v. Kiley, 153 Mass. 123, 26 N. E. 421; Pye v. Faxon, 156 Mass. 471, 31 N. E. 640; Harding v. Boston, 163 Mass. 14-19, 39 N. E. 411, and cases cited; Cabot v. Kingman, 166 Mass. 403-406, 33 L. R. A. 45, 44 N. E. 344; Robbins v. Atkins, 168 Mass. 45, 46 N. E. 425; Thompson v. Lowell, L. & H. R. Co. 170 Mass. 577, 40 L. R. A. 345, 49 N. E. 913; Quinn v. Crimmins, 171 Mass. 255, 256, 42 L. R. A. 101, 50 N. E. 624; Boomer v. Wilbur, 176 Mass. 482, 53 L. R. A. 172, 57 N. E. 1004; Sessengut v. Posey, 67 Ind. 408, 33 Am. Rep. 98; Anderson v. East, 117 Ind. 126, 2 L. R. A. 712, 19 N. E. 726; Chicago v. Robbins, 2 Black, 418-428, 17 L. ed. 298-304; Homan v. Stanley, 66 Pa. 464, 5 Am. Rep. 389; New York v. Bailey, 2 Denio, 433; Bower v. Peate, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 321; Tarry v. Ashton, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 314; Gray v. Pullen, 5 Best & S. 970-981; Dalton v. Angus, L. R. 6 App. Cas. 740, 829. The duty which the law imposes upon an owner of real estate in such a case is to make the conditions safe so far as it can be done by the exercise of ordinary care on the part of all those engaged in the work. He is responsible for the negligence of independent contractors as well as for that of his servants. This rule is applicable to everyone who builds an ordinary wall which is liable to do serious injury by falling outside of his own premises. It is the rule on which the decision in Gorham v. Gross, 125 Mass. 232, 28 Am. Rep. 234, rests, and the case is not an authority for any liability of a landowner that goes beyond this. See also Gray v. Harris, 107 Mass. 492, 9 Am. Rep. 61; Shrewsbury v. Smith, 12 Cush. 177. The uses of property governed by this rule are those that bring new conditions which involve risks to the persons or property of others, but which are ordinary and usual, and, in a sense, natural, as incident to the ownership of the land. The rule first referred to applies to unusual and extraordinary uses which are so fraught with peril to others that the owner should not be permitted to adopt them for his own purposes without absolutely protecting his neighbors from injury or loss by reason of the use. In England this rule, which was laid down in Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 330, L. R. 1 Exch. 267, in reference to a reservoir of water, has since been held to be inapplicable where the collection of the water is in the natural and ordinary use of the land. Fletcher v. Smith, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 781. See Carstairs v. Taylor, L. R. 6 Exch. 217. So far as we know, there is no case in which it has been applied to the erection or maintenance of the walls of an ordinary building.

The construction which should be put upon the judge's charge in regard to liability for standing walls is by no means certain. Some broad statements in it might seem to indicate that he was laying down a rule applicable to the construction and maintenance of walls of ordinary buildings so situated that if they fall they will be likely to injure the property of the adjacent owner. If this were the true meaning, the instruction would be wrong. But, taking the charge in its different parts in connection with the facts stated in the bill of exceptions, we think it was intended to state the rule applicable to the kind of wall that the jury were considering, and not to the walls of buildings generally. As was decided in a previous suit brought by this plaintiff, the life of the building had been destroyed by fire, and the walls which subsequently fell were no longer used in supporting a building. Ainsworth v. Mt. Moriah Lodge, A. F. & A. M. 172 Mass. 257, 52 N. E. 81. Not only was this the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses, but it was the substance of the evidence introduced by the defendant. His experts testified that, before any part of the wall could safely be built upon, the third story, at least, would have to be taken down. This upper part of the wall was that which was most in danger of falling, and the part whose fall would be most likely to do damage. To maintain it, or to leave it standing to its full height, could serve no useful purpose. Its condition in reference to fitness for use was an undisputed fact on the evidence. Instead of being a part of a building adapted to occupation, it was a part of the ruins of a building. To maintain such a wall after the expiration of a reasonable time for investigation and for its removal would not be a reasonable and proper use of one's property. It was the duty of the defendant not to suffer such a wall to remain on his land, where its fall would injure his neighbor, without using such care in the maintenance of it as would absolutely prevent injuries, except from causes over which he would have no control, such as vis major, acts of public enemies, or wrongful acts of third persons which human foresight could not reasonably be expected to anticipate and prevent. This was the rule of law stated by the judge to the jury. With this construction of the charge we think that the jury were rightly directed to a consideration of the evidence on the principal issue of fact.

The jury were instructed to allow interest on the amount of damages from the date of the injury. It would have been more accurate to instruct them that in assessing damages of this kind a plaintiff is not to be awarded interest as interest, but that in ascertaining the damage at the date of the verdict the jury should take into account the lapse of time, and put the plaintiff in as good a position in reference to the injury as if the damages directly resulting from it had been paid immediately. Fraser v. Bigelow Carpet Co. 141 Mass. 126, 4 N. E. 620. This principle would authorize the jury to fix the damages at the date of their verdict by adding interest at the legal rate on the amount of damages at the time of the injury, but it would not require them to do this. There might be circumstances such that an allowance less than interest at 6 per cent would compensate for the delay.

The damages in this case were of a different character from the amount to be awarded for the taking of land under the right of eminent domain, in which the value of the property rights taken should be paid at the time of the taking. See Old Colony R. Co. v. Miller, 125 Mass. 1-3, 28 Am. Rep. 194. But it does not appear that there was anything in this case to take it out of the ordinary rule in regard to compensation for a delay in payment by the allowance of interest. In the absence of anything in the bill of exceptions to show that the defendant was injured by the instruction, we are of opinion that a new trial should not be granted.

The defendant made many requests for instructions, which we do not think it necessary to consider more particularly.

Exceptions overruled.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

Agnes FUCHS, Respt.,

v.

City of ST. LOUIS, Appt.

(.....Mo.....)

1. Objection to the overruling of a demurrer to plaintiff's evidence is waived by the introduction of evidence on behalf of defendant.
2. Preserving an exception to the refusal by the trial court of a peremptory instruction to find for defendant on the whole evidence requires the appellate court to review the evidence as a whole.
3. No recovery can be had against a city for injuries caused by an explosion in a sewer, which is alleged to have resulted from negligently permitting petroleum to be turned into it, where the evidence shows that the explosion might have resulted from another cause, and there is nothing to show that it did not do so.
4. A city is not bound to open vents and manholes leading to its sewers, to permit the escape of gases which are generated therein, as a means of avoiding an explosion, although it may have notice that a quantity of crude petroleum has found its way into the sewer as a result of a fire at the refinery.
5. Under an allegation of negligence on the part of a municipality in failing to prevent the formation and accumulation of gases in a sewer, and in failing to open the vents to permit their escape, which resulted in an explosion, evidence is not admissible that the explosion might have been prevented by the use of ventilating apparatus.
6. Testimony of a mining engineer who has never investigated the ventilation of sewers, as to a method of preventing an explosion in a sewer, is not admissible in an action to recover for loss caused by such explosion, where he states that he never saw any practical attempt made to utilize the method suggested, and never knew of such attempt, and has made no experiments himself.

7. The mere fact of an explosion of gases in a sewer is not sufficient to charge the municipality with liability for the injury caused thereby.
8. The explosion of gases in a sewer to the injury of abutting property owners cannot reasonably be anticipated from the fact of the escape of a quantity of crude petroleum into it, so as to charge the municipality with negligence in failing to provide for the escape of the gases generated thereby.
9. A judgment in plaintiff's favor on his appeal from and involuntary nonsuit granted at the close of his evidence is not conclusive on an appeal by defendant from a judgment in plaintiff's favor at the close of all the evidence, which differs in many essential particulars from that introduced at the first trial.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for St. Louis County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of her husband. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. B. Schnurmacher and Charles Claffin Allen, for appellant:

If the proof had shown the presence of a large body of oil, it also showed that there was no practical, feasible method by which the city authorities could have removed it, the mouth of the sewer being submerged by high water in the Mississippi river. And it also showed that there was no practical, feasible measure or precaution for preventing the formation of gases, or for ventilating the sewer. There was therefore nothing practical which the city could do, or which it omitted to do. Therefore it was not guilty of negligence.

No such explosion in a sewer had ever before occurred. The accident was one that could not be foreseen; it was unexpected, unavoidable, and inevitable, and for its consequences the city is not liable.

The evidence showed the presence of explosive gases other than those arising from oil; gases which are usually present in sewers, the result of decaying organic and vegetable matter. An explosion of these gases would as readily (and more readily) account for the explosion as the theory of plaintiff. Under such circumstances, there can be no recovery in the absence of positive proof as to which of the two causes produced the accident.

The sewer was maintained by the city purely as a sanitary measure. Even if the officers in charge thereof were negligent under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the city would not be liable.

The fact that the court reversed and remanded the case for a new trial on the former appeal disposed absolutely of no question in the case, except that if, upon such new trial, the plaintiff's evidence should be the same she would be entitled to go before the jury.

Tittman, Special Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit, which is an action brought by Agnes Fuchs to recover damages for the death of her husband, Carl E. Fuchs, was filed September 16, 1892, in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis. The defendants in the suit as originally brought were the city of St. Louis and the Waters-Pierce Oil Company. The case first came to trial in April, 1893, in which plaintiff was forced to submit to a nonsuit. She appealed to this court, which affirmed the judgment of the lower court as to the Waters-Pierce Oil Company, but reversed the judgment as to the city of St. Louis, and remanded the case for a new trial. The opinion of the court on that appeal will be found in Fuchs v. St. Louis, 133 Mo. 168, 34 L. R. A. 118, 31 S. W. 115, 34 S. W. 508. The case was finally tried in the circuit court of St. Louis county, to which it had been taken by change of venue, resulting in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff against the remaining defendant, the city of St. Louis. After an unsuccessful motion for a new trial, the city appealed to this court.

The petition alleges that her deceased husband, on or about May 26, 1884, became the owner of a lot of ground lying on the east side of Fourth street, about 139 feet southwardly of Chouteau avenue, and that in the following year he erected on said lot a building, covering the entire width of the lot, and extending back about 70 feet; that said building was of brick, three stories high, with a cellar, the cellar and the first floor being designed for the storing of wines and liquors, and the carrying on of a wine and liquor business; and that upon the completion of said building her husband fitted up and furnished said cellar and first floor with bar fixtures, shelving, etc., and thereafter, and until his death, carried on a wine and liquor business in said premises. The petition further alleges that on the 22d day of July, 1892, the Waters-Pierce Oil Company engaged in the business of buying, storing, and selling oils, had on hand in its premises a large stock of oil, in barrels and other packages, and that on said day a fire occurred in said company's premises, "and that said oil company then and there carelessly and negligently did cause, suffer, and permit the said oils to escape, and to run into the sewer hereinafter mentioned, and to fill up said sewer, and to generate the gases which caused the explosion in and destruction of said sewer on the 26th day of July, 1892;" the city of St. Louis constructed a main sewer, known as the "Mill Creek Sewer," leading from the center of the city to the Mississippi river, and designed to drain the surface waters falling within the reach of the sewer, and to carry off into the river waters from private dwellings and certain city buildings; that, so far as it was practical to do so, the sewer was constructed beneath the public streets and alleys of the 57 L. R. A.

city, and that it thus crossed underneath Fourth street to the east line of said street, where said line intersects the lot of ground purchased by the deceased husband of plaintiff; that, under a license from the then owners of said lot, the city was permitted to construct said sewer underneath the same, and to carry it eastwardly under said lot towards the river, said sewer being located below the cellar thereafter constructed by said deceased; that when the city obtained said license from the owners it agreed with them and their assigns to keep and maintain the sewer in good order, and to care for the same, so that said lot and any improvements which might thereafter be placed thereon would be free from danger of injury on account of said sewer or the use thereof. The petition then alleges "that said sewer was provided with openings specially designed to carry off any gases which might arise in said sewer and be liable to combustion and explosion, and that said sewer and the openings thereof aforesaid, on and prior to the said 26th day of July, 1892, were in the sole care and control of defendant the city of St. Louis, its agents and servants, yet the said city, its agents and servants, knowing that said defendant the Waters-Pierce Oil Company had flooded said sewer with oil, neglected to open said vents and carelessly and negligently failed to take measures and precautions to prevent gases arising and accumulating in said sewer so as to endanger the same; and that between the said 22d and 26th days of July, 1892, gases did arise and accumulate in said sewer in great and very dangerous quantities, and on the date last named, and within six months next before the commencement of this suit, ignited and exploded with great force, throwing open said sewer underneath the property of said Carl E. Fuchs, shattering his said building, and also then and there causing the death of said Carl E. Fuchs;" that by reason of said wrongful acts of defendants, whereby the death of her said husband was caused, she has been damaged in the sum of $5,000, for which she prayed judgment. The answer of defendant was a general denial. At the close of plaintiff's case, defendant offered an instruction in the nature of a demurrer to her evidence, and at the close of the whole case it offered a peremptory instruction to find for the defendant. Both instructions were overruled by the court.

The evidence shows that "Mill Creek Sewer," as it is called, is one of the leading public sewers of the city of St. Louis, and, considering its length and dimensions, is one of the largest sewers in the world. It was built some thirty-four years before the explosion therein, in a most substantial manner that left nothing to be desired, of heavy, massive masonry, sides and arch. It takes its name from the fact that it follows an old natural creek which was known as "Mill Creek," and which formerly constituted the natural drainage of a large portion of the city, emptying into the Mississippi river at a point between Chouteau avenue and Convent street, about four blocks east of the Fuchs premises. At its mouth at the river, the sewer is about 24 feet by 14 feet in dimensions, and grows smaller as it reaches its western or beginning point. At the place where it runs under Fuchs' premises its dimensions, according to the testimony of Mr. Colby, the sewer commissioner, is 20 by 15 feet. The natural creek ran in a diagonal direction over the lot acquired in 1884 by Mr. Fuchs. At the time when he purchased the sewer had already been constructed and covered with earth or ballast. This he removed, in order to construct his cellar, leaving about 6 inches of earth or cinders between the floor of the cellar and the top of the sewer arch. The premises of the Waters-Pierce Oil Company were situated on Gratiot and Thirteenth streets, and in their yards were erected a number of sheet-iron tanks, and stored a number of barrels containing oils. On July 22, 1892, a fire broke out in these premises, during which a number of tanks and barrels caught fire. Some were left intact, the oil in some exploded and was consumed in the explosion, while in others it was displaced by the throwing of water into the tanks by the fire engines. The water mixed with burning oil ran through the premises and down into what is known as the railroad valley. There being danger that some of the standing cars might catch fire, drains or chutes were constructed by the railroad people and by the firemen, and it appears that this running water and oil was led between the tracks to a drain or inlet in the valley, the surface of which was covered with cinders. Some of the oil and water ran into a drain or inlet in the yard of the oil company's premises. At the time of the fire the Mississippi river was at a very high stage, and the mouth of the sewer was submerged by high water. The explosion which caused Mr. Fuchs' death occurred in the afternoon of July 26, 1892, or four days after the fire. It appears that the Peters Fish & Oyster Company, a concern doing business at the French Market, which was somewhat south of Mr. Fuchs' place, used in connection with their business a basement under house No. 1026 South Fourth street, about five stores south of Mr. Fuchs' place. An employee named Humpert was at work in the cellar storing melons, and, happening to pass over a drain in the cellar floor with a lighted candle, there was a sudden flash of flame, and almost simultaneously the explosion in the Mill Creek sewer occurred. The drain or sewer thus referred to connected with a sewer in the rear of the premises, which in turn connected with the Mill Creek sewer, as one of its numerous connections. Only that portion of the sewer was blown up which was immediately under the cellar. In the back yard, where the earth had not been removed, the sewer remained intact. According to the testimony, the break in the sewer at Mr. Fuchs' place indicated clearly the outlines of the former cellar floor. About two blocks east of the Fuchs place, and nearer the river, where the slope of the ground is downward, with but little surface ballast to cover it, there was an open break of 300 feet or more in length. These are the general facts of the case, as shown by the voluminous record in this case. Other specific facts, bearing more immediately on the principles of law involved, will be noticed and mentioned hereafter.

Counsel for appellant, in his brief and in his printed and oral argument, insisted that the court erred in not sustaining its demurrer to plaintiff's evidence at the close of her case. When that demurrer was overruled, defendant waived its objection to the action of the court, by afterwards introducing evidence in its behalf. But having offered a peremptory instruction to find for the defendant at the close of the case, and having duly preserved the point, we are required to review the evidence taken as a whole (Hilz v. Missouri P. R. Co. 101 Mo. 36, 13 S. W. 946; Weber v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. 100 Mo. 194, 7 L. R. A. 819, 12 S. W. 804, 13 S. W. 587; Hite v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 130 Mo. 132, loc. cit. 141, 31 S. W. 262, 32 S. W. 33), and when this is done, then, in the light of the principles of law applicable thereto, there can be but one conclusion, and that is that the plaintiff cannot recover in this action. At the outset it may be stated that there is not the slightest testimony in the record tending to prove the allegation in plaintiff's petition that, when the city constructed the sewer through and underneath the lot subsequently acquired by the deceased, it agreed with the then owners and their assigns to keep and maintain said sewer in good order, and to care for the same, so that said lot and any improvements which might thereafter be placed thereon would be free from danger or injury on account of said sewer or the use thereof. This allegation, of necessity, implies a contractual relation existing between the deceased and the city. There being no evidence to support it, it follows that any idea of such contractual relation between the parties must be eliminated from this inquiry, and it further follows that whatever claim the plaintiff may have against the city must be predicated upon the nonperformance of a legal duty due and owing by it to the deceased. Such duty and its violation, upon which the plaintiff bases her claim for damages, must be found in and determined by the allegations of the petition. These allegations are: That oils escaped from the Waters-Pierce Oil Company at the time of the fire hereinbefore referred to; that they ran into the Mill Creek sewer; that such oils generated gases, and that such gases caused the explosion in and destruction of the sewer on July 26, 1892, by which explosion deceased lost his life; that the sewer was provided with openings specially designed to carry off any gases which might arise in said sewer and be liable to combustion and explosion; that, nevertheless, the city, knowing of the presence of oil in the sewer, neglected to open said vents and carelessly and negligently failed to take measures and precautions to prevent gases arising and accumulating in said sewer so as to endanger the same. It will thus appear from these allegations that plaintiff charges that the gases which were generated in the sewer were so generated from the oils which escaped and ran into the sewer from the Waters-Pierce Oil Company, at the time of the fire on its premises which caused the explosion. It will also appear that there are two charges of negligence, namely, one as a specific charge of negligence, in that the city, knowing of the existence of oils in the sewer, did not open the vents specially designed for the purposes of, presumably, to permit the gases thus generated to escape, and, in addition, another charge of negligence to the effect that it carelessly and negligently failed to take measures and precautions to prevent gases arising and accumulating in the sewer. In these allegations of nonaction on the part of the city are contained the charges against it of legal duties not performed.

1. It is conceded that oil escaped from the Waters-Pierce Oil Company at the time of the fire, and it may fairly be inferred from the evidence that some of the escaping oil ran into the Mill Creek sewer; but a careful reading and re-reading of the record herein fails to disclose any evidence from which even an inference could be drawn that sufficient oil flowed into this large sewer from which were generated sufficient gases to cause the explosion complained of. Indeed there is a total lack of evidence to prove that the explosion was, in fact, caused by gases generated from the escaping oils, as charged. On the other hand, the evidence showed that there were gases other than those arising from oil, present in the sewer at the time of the explosion,—gases which are always present in sewers, and which form as the result of decaying organic and vegetable matter, and which are both inflammable and explosive. Plaintiff's witness Frederick Egner, a gas engineer, testified that from his general reading he knew there was a constant generation of inflammable gas in sewers from vegetable and animal matters, which is called sewer gas, and is a mixture of sulphuretted hydrogen and marsh gas, the latter of which emanates from decaying vegetable matter. He had heard of gases which would ignite and burn spontaneously on the surface of water in a stream or lake when stirred up. He had read of such cases, and believed such gas was common in sewers, because the conditions were favorable. Such gas was generated from human excrement and rotting vegetables and animal matter. He believed that the explosion of sulphuretted hydrogen and marsh gas would be of the same violence as the explosion of petroleum vapor. So also testified plaintiff's expert Hunicke. He states that a gas generates from decomposing vegetable matters which is called methane or marsh gas, and which is explosive; another gas, according to witness, which generates from human excrement, being carbonic acid, more or less, and sulphuretted hydrogen. The latter gas smells like rotten eggs, and is quite explosive when mixed with air. These are the only witnesses who refer to the subject on behalf of plaintiff. That explosive gases form in sewers and are ever present therein was also shown by experts introduced by defendant. Since, then, the gases which form naturally in sewers are as highly inflammable and explosive as the vapors thrown off by kerosene or other oils, and since there was no evidence furnished by plaintiff from which the jury could draw the inference that the explosion was of the latter rather than of the former character of gas, it cannot be said that the allegations of the petition were established, or that the verdict should be permitted to stand. In fact the theory that the explosion was caused by the usual sewer gases is the more likely one, since all the witnesses agreed that the oils which escaped during the fire at the Waters-Pierce Oil Company's premises will throw off vapors in comparative abundance only when subjected to heat. Upon this subject Egner stated that it could not be told how much oil it would take to generate enough gas in Mill Creek sewer under ordinary temperature to cause such an explosion as that which occurred. He did say, however, "I should think it would require a good deal of it in a large sewer like that. Assuming the temperature of the sewer to have been 60 or 70 degrees, or even 75 degrees, the quantity of vapor generated from crude petroleum would be comparatively small." Witness further stated that the temperature in a sewer would likely be lower than the temperature in the exposed atmosphere. Mr. Choller, also a gas engineer, who had made a special study of the subject, testified that even if petroleum or crude oil got into the sewer it would not have cast off gasoline or coal oil under a temperature below 95 degrees. Therefore, if at the fire crude oil found its way into the sewer, that would not account for the presence of either coal oil or gasoline, because the application of heat would be necessary to produce either. As for coal oil, or kerosene, they are combustible, but not explosive. It was for plaintiff to account for the explosion and the causes of it, and, there being present at least two independent causes, and no proof as to which of the two was responsible for the accident, there can be no recovery. Breen v. St. Louis Cooperage Co. 50 Mo. App. 202; Searles v. Manhattan R. Co. 101 N. Y. 661, 5 N. E. 66; Dobbins v. Brown, 119 N. Y. 188, 23 N. E. 537.

2. There is no evidence in the record to show that there were openings into the sewer "especially designed to carry off any gases which might arise in said sewer and be liable to combustion and explosion." The evidence, what there was of it on this subject, tends to show that there were certain manholes and certain inlets. The former were intended as a means of ingress and egress for making inspections of and repairs in the sewer, whilst the latter were intended to permit the surface water from the streets to flow into it. Moreover, the evidence tends to show that from the river to Sixth street, one block west of Broadway, there were, besides the many private sewer connections, altogether six manholes, which, with the exception of perhaps one, had perforated covers, twenty-seven open inlets, and two open vaults. Two of these open, grated iron covers were situated in the alley in the rear of the Fuchs place; an open inlet on the southwest corner of Broadway and Chouteau avenue opposite thereto, and one manhole somewhat south thereof, near the meat market, which had a solid cover. But as to this the removal of the cover would have been useless, because, at the request of the people of the neighborhood, the city had put a "goose neck" device into that manhole to prevent the odors and gases of the sewer from emanating therefrom. It was so constructed that the gas could not issue out of the sewer, cover or no cover. Notwithstanding all these openings, it is apparent that whatever gases there were in the sewer did not rise and escape therefrom. But suppose we concede, as is claimed by respondent, that there were certain closed covers to some of the sewer openings which might have been removed; it does not appear that their removal would have done any practical good. To say so is to indulge in mere conjecture.

3. Assuming that the allegations of respondent's petition with respect to the matters hereinbefore referred to have been proved, what was, as a matter of law, the appellant's duty with respect to the premises? A sewer is defined to be "a drain or passage to carry off water and filth under ground; a subterranean channel, particularly in cities." Webster, Dict. Sewers are constructed as sanitary measures, for the public good, to carry off all sewage, consisting of human excrements and refuse animal and vegetable matter, which, as the testimony shows, and as everybody knows, constantly and continuously generates gases, noxious and dangerous, as the result of the constant and continuous process of nature. It is intended and is the object of sewers to carry off and to guard the substances from which they spring. Sewers are supposed to be covered, and to be so constructed as to prevent the escape of gases generated in them. It is not intended that they be permitted to disseminate and breed disease, or to cause injury to personal or property rights. If this is not so, then there is no need of sewers, and whilst it is necessary, in order that the city may, in the exercise of its ministerial function, properly repair and maintain its sewers, that there should be certain openings or manholes, to permit ingress thereto and egress therefrom, and hence it becomes necessary to occasionally remove the covers, the city would be remiss in its duty were it to deliberately remove the covers for the purpose of permitting the escape of all the vile, noxious, and dangerous gases which, through nature's laws, are constantly produced therein. Thus, in Atlanta v. Warnock, 91 Ga. 210, 23 L. R. A. 301, 18 S. E. 135, Mrs. Warnock brought her petition for injunction against the city 57 L. R. A.

of Atlanta, alleging that the city had opened two manholes, 2 feet in diameter, with perforated tops, into the large sewer extending along Wheat street, both within a few feet of petitioner's property, which fronts 290 feet on Wheat street, and 150 feet on Courtland street, where she and her family have resided for twelve years, one of the manholes being on the corner of the two streets, and the other on Wheat street, with no trap or obstruction to prevent the foul sewer gas from coming up through the same; that this gas is exceedingly offensive and dangerous to the health and lives of petitioner and other occupants of her premises. It comes up in great volumes, especially after a short dry spell, and is distressingly troublesome and annoying in warm weather, driving petitioner and her family and friends from the veranda of her house, compelling her to shut the windows in the warmest weather, and making life unbearable; that she had made frequent applications to the various officers of the city, all with no effect, etc.; that the way to abate the nuisance is to place a solid instead of a perforated top on the manhole, and she prayed "that the state's writ of injunction do issue, restraining the said defendant from keeping said mouths of said manholes open, and from continuing said nuisance in front of petitioner's premises." The court below, after hearing, ordered "that the defendant be enjoined from continuing said manholes in such condition as to allow the escape of noxious gases," and this action of the lower court was affirmed by the supreme court. Hardy v. Brooklyn, 90 N. Y. 435, 43 Am. Rep. 182, was an action against the city for damages resulting from a nuisance alleged to have been caused by the negligent construction of a sewer. It appeared that by the plan of the sewer, as adopted and filed by the board of water commissioners, it ran past plaintiff's premises to a point where it would find a proper discharge. The sewer was constructed to a point a short distance above the plaintiff's premises, and there a wooden trough or shoot was built to carry off its contents, in consequence of which noxious and deadly gases were emitted, injuriously affecting plaintiff's premises. The plaintiff recovered damages, and the court of appeals affirmed the judgment. The plaintiff in this case charges a dereliction of duty on the part of the defendant in not opening its vents or manholes to permit the generated gases to escape. In the Georgia case referred to, the city was enjoined from opening the manholes permitting the gases to escape. In the New York case, the city was mulcted in damages because it permitted gases to escape. We have thus presented to us the anomaly that, if plaintiff's theory be correct, the city is liable, on the one hand, for not opening the manholes, and for not permitting the gases to escape, and, on the other hand, to be enjoined or mulcted in damages for doing so. As Judge Sherwood says, in his dissenting opinion on the former decision of this case (133 Mo. loc. cit. 200, 34 L. R. A. 126, 34 S. W. 514): "Again, if the city is to be held responsible for failing to keep open the vents to the sewers within its jurisdiction, is it to be held liable also if some person passing while the vents are open casts a lighted match into one of them, or the gas from it rises and catches fire from a street lamp, thereby causing an explosion? Is it possible that the city be thus held responsible whether it does or does not open vents? And yet if the position taken by plaintiff as ground for recovery in this action be correct, that the city is responsible for the gases which breed in its sewers, then the spectacle will soon be presented of actions for damages against the city, because: First, it does not open its sewers, and thereby allow the gases therefrom to escape, thereby causing an explosion; because, second, it does open its sewers, and thereby an explosion is caused; because, third, it opens its sewers to allow the gases to escape, and thereby becomes liable for diseases and death, scattered by reason of the escape of such gases." That the manholes or vents should not be kept open to permit the escape of dangerous gases is demonstrated by the facts of this case. If the drain or sewer in Peters' cellar, four or five stores south of Fuchs' place, into which gas was evidently forced from the Mill Creek sewer through connecting sewers, had not been open, permitting gas to escape into the cellar, and to come into contact with Humpert's lighted candle, the catastrophe would never have happened. The cause of the unfortunate death of Mr. Fuchs was because there was an open inlet, through which gas escaped, which, coming into contact with the flame of the candle, caused the explosion. We conclude therefore that it was not the duty of the city to open its manholes in order to permit the escape of gases that had accumulated in the sewer.

4. The other allegation of negligence, namely, that the defendant "carelessly and negligently failed to take measures and precautions to prevent gases arising and accumulating in said sewer," is easily disposed of. There was no evidence to sustain this allegation. As we have stated, the testimony shows that there is a constant generation of inflammable gases in sewers, and there was not the slightest suggestion on the part of any one of the witnesses as to any known method of arresting what counsel for appellant aptly calls "one of the never-ceasing processes of nature." On the contrary, the testimony was all the other way.

5. At the trial of this case, the plaintiff, against defendant's objection, was allowed to show by her expert witness, Prof. H. A. Hunicke, that, if a manhole cover had been removed, in his opinion the use of a fan or blower of seven horse power would have eliminated the gases, so as to render them nonexplosive by blowing air into or sucking the gases out of the sewer. The petition in the case alleged two specific acts of negligence against the city: A failure to prevent the formation and accumulation of gases, and a failure to ventilate the sewer by opening the vents specially designed to carry off gases. There was no allegation of neglect of duty on the part of the city in not using a fan or blower or any other contrivance or design to carry off or destroy the gases. It is settled that, where specific acts of negligence are charged, evidence of other acts is inadmissible. Atchison v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 80 Mo. 213. The testimony should therefore have been excluded. There are other reasons why the testimony of this witness should have been disregarded, and the jury should have been instructed so to do as requested by appellant. His testimony, so far as it is necessary to refer to it, is substantially as follows: "I am a consulting chemist and mining engineer, and have been for sixteen years. I was for four years professor of applied chemistry at Washington University, St. Louis, from which university I am a graduate. I have had practical experience in mines in New Mexico, Colorado, and Illinois, and am familiar with coal oils and other substances. Petroleum is the term applied to a mineral oil occurring in nature. Petroleum means oil from the rock, and is equivalent to crude oil as it is pumped from the earth. Petroleum when released will evaporate at all temperatures. It will give up the lighter constituents until the air about it is saturated. It is the same as with water. The air around it will take up so much water as will saturate it. The evaporation naturally increases as the temperature increases; that is, the higher the temperature the more rapid the evaporation. The less volatile and more solid portion of the oil will remain. All the vapors of petroleum are combustible, and will explode when mixed with the proper amount of air or oxygen. Explosion is a rapid burning. In order to produce an explosion there must be an ignition. . . . None of these oils or products that I have mentioned appear in mines, but gases do. Gases accumulate more in coal mines than in metal mines. I had some experience in taking care of mines and removing gases from them. I have heard the manholes on Fourth and Fifth streets described, but don't know that I have ever seen them. Q. Now, suppose these manhole covers were removed, or a manhole cover was removed from one of the manholes, what scientific appliance was there, well known previous to 1892, for creating a draft through this manhole? (To which question counsel for defendant objected, on the ground that the witness had not qualified or undertaken to qualify to answer the question, he not having pretended that he ever made a study of the science or method of removing gases from sewers.) Court: From the experience you have had, practically and scientifically, can you answer that question? A. To know what to do? Court: Yes. A. I might say at the outset that it is an engineering, not a scientific, problem, and would depend very largely on the individual who has charge of it. Q. As an engineer, can you answer us? A. Well, things that might suggest themselves to me as a mining engineer might not present themselves to others. Q. Professor, I will ask you the question this way: Was there, previous to 1892, any well-known appliance or means for ventilating, by means of which a sewer could be ventilated, a manhole cover being removed? (To which question defendant, by its counsel, again objected, on the ground that the witness had not qualified as an expert on the ventilating of sewers, and had further already stated that he is a mining engineer, and what would suggest itself to an engineer in charge of a sewer.) The Court: If you know of any one you may answer it. (To which action and ruling of the court, defendant, by counsel, then and there duly excepted.) A. So it refers only to one hole? Q. Yes. (Counsel for defendant again objected, on the ground that this question of the witness and answer of counsel made the question still more incompetent.) The witness proceeds: The means would have been possible, but under the circumstances it would require considerable time to eliminate the gases by simply opening a manhole. It would be necessary to apply means, and nothing short of a blower would have done in that case. A blower of, say, seven horse power would have removed the air, or replaced the air sufficiently to be nonexplosive, within thirty-six hours. When the crude oil got into the sewer, it would tend to evaporate and rise, like sugar in coffee, although the sugar is heavier than the coffee. This vapor, rising up in the sewer, would continue through the air until the air was saturated and could take up no more, and will tend to creep out through any overhead holes. The most natural point for placing the blower would be at the opening closest to the river. Either a pressure blower or suction fan might have been applied at a point further up. Fans will either blow or draw air, so the point may differ. It would be preferable to blow the air in instead of drawing it out. Cross-examination: I never saw any practical attempt made, either in the city of St. Louis or in this country, or anywhere in the world, to extract gas out of a sewer by means of a fan or blower. Neither did I ever know of any sewer commissioner anywhere in the United States attempt to blow air into a sewer filled with gas, or suck air out of a sewer filled with gas, by means of a fan. I can't give any positive information touching that, and I never saw it done. I know that experiments have been made in London, but I have no knowledge or observation of its ever having been put to practical use. I don't know whether, in order to suck air out of a sewer, it would be necessary to close all of the apertures except the one at which the fan was at work in order to create a suction. That would depend upon what the purpose of the suction was. If you were trying to suck gas out of this court room, and the windows were all up, and you put your fan at one of the windows, it would not work. In order to make the fan work and create a suction, I would want an opening at which to put the fan, and the balance of the openings closed. I would want a certain ratio of inlet and outlet. I don't know how many drains, inlets, openings, or connections there were to the Mill Creek sewer within a circle of 500 feet around the manhole where I stood and would station the blower or fan, but I say that without knowing that, and without myself having experimented with this sewer, or having seen it attempted anywhere in the world, my plan would have prevented an explosion. I say that, because the connections can be opened and closed, and if the gas had been sucked out the fresh air would have rushed in to supply its place to such an extent that a flame held at the opening would not have ignited it. I have never attempted to use a blower myself in connection with a sewer, nor have I ever seen one used, and, as I have stated, I have no experience or observation in that direction. I know that the Mill Creek sewer extends to a mile west of the river, and that other sewers, of various sizes, and from all directions, lead into it, and I know that some of them have open or perforated covers. But, notwithstanding all these connections and openings into the main sewer, I should not hesitate to apply the blower on my plan. I know that a blower would have been effective without ever having experimented. I do not recollect whether or not at the last trial I testified that the thought of using the fan or blower had occurred to me as a scientific possibility, but that without a practical experiment I could not say whether it would accomplish any result; since I testified last time I have made no experiments to ascertain whether the plan was a practicable or feasible one." It will appear from the foregoing that the witness is a mining engineer and a consulting chemist; that he never, as a scientist, investigated the ventilation of sewers, and never gave the subject of sewers a particular or special study; that he did not claim that his proposed remedy had ever been practically applied, or even made the subject of experiment by himself. He says that he never saw any practical attempt made in St. Louis, or in this country, or anywhere in the world, to extract gases out of a sewer by means of a fan or blower, nor did he ever know of any sewer commissioner anywhere within the United States attempting to blow air into a sewer filled with gas, or suck air out of a sewer filled with gas, by means of a fan. He could not give any positive information about that, and he never saw it done. Experiments were made in London, but he had no knowledge or observation of its ever having been put to practical use. He never had attempted to use a blower in connection with a sewer, nor had he ever seen one used, nor had he ever had any experience or observation in that direction. He had testified in the case twice before, but had made no experiments with respect to the matter since that time. So far as the record shows, Prof. Hunicke's proposed remedy is a mere theory of his own. Practical engineers, who had devoted years to the study and management of sewers, testified that Mr. Hunicke's scheme is entirely impracticable. Not one of them had ever heard of it. Not one of them knew of any known practical or feasible method by which the gases could have been extracted from the sewer. It would be monstrous to predicate a charge of negligence against the city on such testimony as that. It should never have been admitted; having been admitted, it should have been entirely disregarded, and the jury instructed to do so, as requested by appellant in its instruction No. 2 refused by the court. Graney v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 157 Mo. 666, 50 L. R. A. 153, 57 S. W. 276.

6. Eliminating from consideration the testimony of the witness Hunicke, and from what has been heretofore stated, it will appear that the respondent had nothing on which to go to the jury save the bare fact that the sewer exploded. But the mere fact of an accident, and the consequent injury resulting therefrom, does not, as a rule, make out a prima facie case. There are cases where the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies, but we can find no adjudicated case where that doctrine was applied to a case like the one before us. Except in cases relating to common carriers of goods and passengers, or arising out of other contractual relations, the mere fact of an explosion, without affirmative proof of negligence, does not raise a prima facie presumption of negligence on the part of defendant. Huff v. Austin, 46 Ohio St. 386, 21 N. E. 864; Cosulich v. Standard Oil Co. 122 N. Y. 123, 25 N. E. 259; Walker v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 71 Iowa, 658, 33 N. W. 224; Loose v. Buchanan, 51 N. Y. 476, 10 Am. Rep. 623. The plaintiff, therefore, made out no case to be submitted to the jury, and she is not aided by any testimony introduced by defendant.

7. Irrespective of what has been said before, there is a vital and fatal objection to respondent's right of recovery in this action. In the case of American Brewing Assn. v. Talbot, 141 Mo. loc. cit. 683, 42 S. W. 682, the court says: "Numerous authorities hold that it is not negligence not to take precautionary measures to prevent an injury which, if taken, would have prevented it, when the injury could not reasonably have been anticipated, and would not, unless under exceptional circumstances, have happened," and in support of that doctrine the court cites, with approval, in addition to a large number of cases, Ray, Negligence of Imposed Duties, pp. 133, 134, as follows: "Mischiefs which could by no reasonable possibility have been foreseen, and which no reasonable person would have anticipated, cannot be taken into account as a basis upon which to predicate a wrong. A reasonable man does not consult his imagination, but can be guided only by a reasonable estimate of probabilities. The reasonable man, then, to whose idea of behavior we are to look as the standard of duty, will neither neglect what his reason and experience will enable him to forecast as probable, nor conduct, on a basis of bare chances, a business whose success is dependent upon his accuracy in forecasting the future. He will order his precaution by the measure of what appears likely in the usual course of things. The proper inquiry is not whether the accident might have been avoided if the one charged with negligence had anticipated its occurrence, but whether, taking the circumstances as they then existed, he was negligent in failing to anticipate and provide against the occurrence. The duty imposed does not require the use of every possible precaution to avoid injury to individuals, nor of any particular means which it may appear, after the accident, would have avoided it. The requirement is only to use such reasonable precautions to prevent accidents as would have been adopted by prudent persons prior to the accident. . . . The prudence and propriety of men's doings are not judged by the event, but by the circumstances under which they act. If they act with reasonable prudence and good judgment, they are not to be made responsible because the event, from causes which could not be foreseen nor reasonably anticipated, has disappointed their expectations." Also Webb's Pollock, Torts, enlarged Am. ed. pp. 45, 46, as follows: "Now a reasonable man can be guided only by a reasonable estimate of probabilities. If men went about to guard themselves against every risk to themselves or others which might by ingenious conjecture be conceived as possible, human affairs could not be carried on at all. The reasonable man, then, to whose ideal behavior we are to look as the standard of duty, will neither neglect what he can forecast as probable, nor waste his anxiety on events that are barely possible. He will order his precaution by the measure of what appears likely in the known course of things. This being the standard, it follows that if in a particular case (not being within certain special and more stringent rules) the harm complained of is not such as a reasonable man in the defendant's place should have foreseen as likely to happen, there is no wrong and no liability." And the statement proposed, though not positively laid down, in Greenland v. Chaplin, 5 Exch. 248, namely, "that a person is expected to anticipate and guard against all reasonable consequences, but that he is not, by the law of England, expected to anticipate and guard against that which no reasonable man would expect to occur," appears to contain the only rule tenable on principle, where the liability is founded solely on negligence. "Mischiefs which could by no possibility have been foreseen, and which no reasonable person would have anticipated" may be the ground of legal compensation under some rule of exceptional severity, and such rules, for various reasons, exist; but under an ordinary rule of due care and caution it cannot be taken into account. The same principle is recognized and applied in Sullivan v. Jefferson Ave. R. Co. 133 Mo. 1, 32 L. R. A. 167, 34 S. W. 566, and also in the large number of cases cited in the dissenting opinion in Fuchs v. St. Louis, 133 Mo. 168, 34 L. R. A. 118, 31 S. W. 115, 34 S. W. 508. A reference to a few other cases, very analogous to the case before us, is not inappropriate. In Sofield v. Sommers, 9 Ben. 526, Fed. Cas. No. 13,157, the facts were these: The fumes of crude petroleum carried in a tank on a lighter used in the oil trade escaped into a locker, which locker,—there being no watchman on board, when the lighter lay one night with other vessels at a pier in Jersey City,—was forced open during the night by a thief, who, exploring the locker with a lighted match, set fire to the gas and caused an explosion and a fire, whereby the lighter and the libellant's lighter that lay alongside were destroyed. Held, that the escape of the gas into the locker was an accident, and the presence of a lighted match in the locker not the natural result of the absence of a watchman; that between the act of omission charged upon the defendant and the explosion charged there intervened an independent human agency, the presence of which had no natural relation to any act of defendant, and which therefore entailed no responsibility upon the defendant for the explosion. In the case of Stone v. Boston & A. R. Co. 171 Mass. 536, 41 L. R. A. 794, 51 N. E. 1, decided by the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, in July, 1898, the facts were that the railroad company maintained a passenger station, freight house, and freight yard, all adjoining a public street or highway, in the village of Spencer. On one side of the freight house was a wooden platform about 8 feet wide, and set on posts in the ground about 4 feet high. The under side of the platform was left open and exposed. It seems that the railroad company was in the habit of storing oil in barrels on and under this platform until called for and taken away by the consignees, and that in consequence thereof the platform had become saturated with oil, much of which dripped to the ground underneath, saturating the rubbish and straw which had collected there. On September 13, 1893, one Casserly, a teamster, brought a load of goods to this platform to be shipped by the railroad company. Lighting his pipe, he threw down the match, which fell to the ground, underneath the platform, and in consequence of the saturation of the rubbish and the platform with oil a fire resulted which spread with great rapidity, exploding several barrels of oil, and soon communicating with plaintiff's buildings fronting upon the street, and about 75 feet distant from the platform, which buildings it destroyed. The testimony of plaintiff showed that some 25 to 30 barrels of oil had been left upon the platform for more than forty-eight hours prior to the accident; that the platform had been thoroughly saturated with oil for at least eight years. The action was to recover from the railroad company the value of plaintiff's buildings thus destroyed. The lower court directed a verdict for defendant, upon which judgment was entered, and this action of the lower court is approved and affirmed by the supreme court. After considering the evidence somewhat in detail, 57 L. R. A.

the court reaches the conclusion that the railroad company was guilty of negligence in the keeping of the oil and in the maintenance of the platform saturated as it was with oil. Having reached this conclusion, the court proceeds to inquire whether this state of facts was the proximate cause of the accident, so as to result in the liability of the company. Discussing this feature of the case, the court says: "Nevertheless the question remains, and in our view this becomes the important and decisive question of the case, whether, assuming that the defendant was thus in fault, the plaintiff introduced any evidence which would warrant a finding by the jury that the damage to his property was a consequence for which the defendant is responsible; or, in other words, whether the act of Casserly in starting the fire was such a consequence of the defendant's original wrong in allowing the oil to remain upon the platform that the defendant is responsible to the plaintiff for it. . . . The rule is very often stated that in law the proximate, and not the remote, cause is to be regarded, and in applying this rule it is sometimes said that the law will not look back from the injurious sequences beyond the last sufficient cause, and especially that where an intelligent and responsible human being has intervened between the original cause and the resulting damage the law will not look back beyond him. This ground of exonerating an original wrongdoer may be found discussed or suggested in the following decisions and text-books, among others: [Here follows a host of references bearing upon the question. Thereupon the court continues its discussion.] It cannot, however, be considered that in all cases the intervention even of a responsible and intelligent human being will absolutely exonerate a preceding wrongdoer. Many instances to the contrary have occurred, but these are usually cases where it has been found that it was the duty of the original wrongdoer to anticipate and provide against such intervention, because such intervention was a thing likely to happen in the ordinary course of events. . . . Was the starting of the fire by Casserly the natural and probable consequence of the defendant's negligent act in leaving the oil upon the platform? According to the usual experience of mankind ought this result to have been apprehended? The question is not whether it was a possible consequence, but whether it was probable; that is, likely to occur to the usual experience of mankind. That this is the true test of responsibility applicable to a case like this has been held in very many cases according to which a wrongdoer is not responsible for a consequence which is merely possible according to occasional experience, but only for a consequence which is probable according to the ordinary and usual experience. One is bound to anticipate and provide against what usually happens, and what is likely to happen; but it would impose too heavy a responsibility to hold him bound in like manner to guard against what is unusual and unlikely to happen, or what, as it is sometimes said, is only remotely and slightly probable. A high degree of caution might, and perhaps would, guard against injurious consequences which are merely possible; but it is not negligence in a legal sense to omit to do so. . . . Tried by this test the defendant is not responsible for the consequences of Casserly's act. There was no close connection between it and the defendant's negligence. There was nothing to show that such a consequence had ever happened before during the eight years covered by the plaintiff's testimony, or that there were any existing circumstances which made it probable that it would happen. It was, of course, possible that some careless person might come along and throw down a lighted match where a fire would be started, . . . but it was not according to the usual and ordinary course of events. In failing to anticipate and guard against such an occurrence or accident, the defendant violated no legal duty which it owed to the plaintiff." It being contended, however, that the negligence of the railroad company concurred with that of Casserly to produce the injury, the court met that contention as follows: "The plaintiff further contends that the negligence of the defendant in keeping the oil upon the platform was concurrent with the careless act of Casserly, and that therefore it was a case where two wrongdoers, acting at the same time, contributed to the injurious result. But this is not a just view of the matter. The negligence of the defendant preceded that of Casserly, and was an existing fact when he intervened." The application of the principles announced in these cases and text-books to the case before us is obvious. To warrant the inference of negligence on the part of the city, it is necessary to conclude: (1) That oil works would burn; (2) that by reason thereof oil would flow into the sewer; (3) that oil reached the sewer in sufficient quantities to generate gas sufficient in quantity to explode it; (4) that during the period whilst the oil was in the sewer someone with a lighted candle would cross a drain leading into a private sewer, leading in turn into another sewer, which, in turn, led into the Mill Creek sewer; and (5) that, before the happening of this later occurrence, the city could have removed the oil or the gases, although, as the testimony shows, no method for doing so existed unless we adopt the individual theory of the witness Hunicke, which, as has already been stated, should be entirely eliminated from consideration in this case. In short, this case presents the instance of an injury which could not have reasonably been anticipated. It would not, unless in exceptional cases, have happened. Whilst the explosion was possible, it was not probable, according to ordinary and usual experience. Although the sewer had been in existence for some thirty-four years, no such explosion had ever happened before, and, in all likelihood, will never happen again. Had it not been for Humpert's legitimate act, the oil and the gases might 57 L. R. A.

have remained in the sewer without injury to anyone until the subsidence of the high water in the river, and without any foundation for fear of hurtful consequences. The facts of the case simply present a case of inevitable accident for which the city cannot be held responsible, because it was not negligent.

8. Counsel for respondent strenuously urges upon the court the plea of res judicata, relying, in its support, upon the opinion and judgment of this court in the former appeal between these parties. When the case was here before, it came up on plaintiff's appeal from an involuntary nonsuit, which she was compelled to suffer. The only question which was then presented to the court was whether, upon the evidence then submitted to the jury and preserved in the record, she made out a prima facie case entitling her to go to the jury. The court held that she did make out such prima facie case, and reversed the judgment and remanded the case for a new trial. Upon the retrial, her case was sent to the jury, countervailing evidence was offered by the defendant, instructions were given, others refused, rulings were had on the competency and admissibility of testimony, and the appellant now appeals from the judgment rendered against it in favor of the respondent. Appellant is, of course, entitled to be heard on the matters of which it complains, and to have the case, as it appears from the present record, reviewed by this court. Moreover, a careful comparison of the facts as they appear from the record now here with the facts as stated by Judge Barclay in his opinion based upon the record then before the court shows that they are not the same, but differ in many essential particulars. Under such circumstances, the doctrine of res judicata does not apply. A reference to a few cases on this subject decided by our own appellate courts will suffice. Nieinhaus v. Spraul, 114 Mo. 551, 21 S. W. 515, 859; Kelly v. Thuey, 143 Mo., loc. cit. 437, 45 S. W. 300; May v. Crawford, 150 Mo., loc. cit. 525, 51 S. W. 693; Gratton & K. Mfg. Co. v. Troll, 77 Mo. App., loc. cit. 344. The view we have taken of this case makes it unnecessary to review the instructions given and refused. This suit was instituted in September, 1892. It was tried three times in the St. Louis circuit court, once in the county of St. Louis, and it was argued in this court at least four times.

As, in our opinion, the defendant cannot be held liable in this action, it will serve no useful purpose to remand the case for a new trial. In so far as the opinion in Fuchs v. St. Louis, 133 Mo. 168, 34 L. R. A. 118, 31 S. W. 115, 34 S. W. 508, conflicts with this opinion, it is overruled, and the judgment of the court below is, with the concurrence of the other judges, reversed.

Burgess, Ch. J., and Sherwood, Robinson, Valliant, and Gantt, JJ., concur. Brace, J., concurs, except as to paragraphs 1 and 5 of the opinion. Marshall, J., not sitting.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

SWIFT & COMPANY, Pfif. in Err.,
v.

Edward BLEISE.

(.....Neb.....)

- *1. Allegation that defendant corporation did certain things by its foreman is a sufficient allegation of the latter's authority, as against an objection to all evidence at the trial.
2. Negligent act of a foreman, with general control, and authority to employ and discharge workmen, in ordering a subject workman upon an elevator, and himself operating the elevator with negligence, to the workman's injury,—Held, properly, regarded by the trial court as not the act of a fellow servant, but of a vice principal.
3. Instruction that defendant's answer denied lameness of plaintiff, where answer really denied that it was caused by defendant, and by the means alleged,—Held, prejudicial error, where there was evidence tending to show a previously existing lameness.
4. Refusal of instruction to the effect that defendant was not responsible for damage caused by want of reasonable care on plaintiff's part after the alleged injury,—Held, erroneous, where evidence had been admitted, without objection, tending to show that plaintiff's condition, expense, and suffering were in part due to his failure to exercise reasonable care after the hurt received.

ERROR to the District Court for Douglas County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. I. R. Andrews for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Ed. P. Smith and James B. Sheehan, for defendant in error:

It was unnecessary to allege in this petition anything further than such facts as would warrant an inference of superiority on the part of Apel over Bleise, and the negligence of such superior servant.

Hastings, C., filed the following opinion:

Thirty-seven assignments of error are made in this case. Comparatively few of them, however, are urged by counsel, and only those will be considered. The first is that the petition does not state a cause of action, for the reason that it is nowhere alleged that the foreman, Fred Apel, had authority or control over the plaintiff, or that it was any part of his duty to operate the elevator in question. The defendant company says that such an allegation was necessary to disclose a right of action against it. The plaintiff's claim in this action is that he was ordered by the defendant, through its foreman, Mr. Apel, to place two trucks upon the elevator in defendant's packing house, and to go down into the lower part of said building to obtain material for sausages required on the sixth floor, for the purpose of smoking them; that the elevator man was absent, and the foreman instructed plaintiff to place himself and the trucks upon the elevator, and that it would be operated by the foreman himself; that he did so; that the foreman attempted to manage the elevator and lower it, but was ignorant of its manner of operation, and incompetent to perform such duties, and lowered the elevator so carelessly, negligently, and recklessly, and with such want of skill, that it fell to the bottom of the building with such violence that plaintiff was thrown against its floor and upon the trucks, and sustained injury in the breaking of the knee cap of his left leg, injuring the tendons and ligaments connected with it, and was otherwise bruised; that his injuries were caused by the ignorance, carelessness, negligence, and lack of skill of the foreman, of which plaintiff was not previously advised. The answer admits that defendant is a corporation; admits that plaintiff was in its service prior to August 3, 1894, and, with other employees, accustomed to use the elevator and go up and down with trucks "as directed;" that Apel operated the elevator in which the plaintiff was descending; denies that plaintiff was injured as alleged; denies that the alleged "lameness and stiffness in his left knee, as well as his suffering in body and mind, is in any wise owing to or the result of any injury received by him in going down in said elevator, as set forth in said plaintiff's petition;" and denies generally. Plaintiff's allegation was that defendant ordered these things to be done, and the admission is that the plaintiff was accustomed to use this elevator "as directed." Ordinarily it is sufficient to enable one to introduce proof of acts done by means of an agent, to allege that the principal did it. Bank of Metropolis v. Gutschliok, 14 Pet. 19, 10 L. ed. 335; Hoosac Min. & Mill. Co. v. Donat, 10 Colo. 529, 18 Pac. 157; Edison Electric Light Co. v. United States Electric Lighting Co. 35 Fed. 134; Burnham v. Milwaukee, 69 Wis. 379, 34 N. W. 389; Todd v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 37 Minn. 358, 35 N. W. 5. Of course, the defendant corporation could act only by an agent. It would seem that the allegations here are sufficient to indicate, at least after a verdict, that the several directions which plaintiff is alleged to have received came from defendant by authority, and that Apel had, with defendant's assent, control of the appliances which it is admitted that plaintiff was accustomed to use "as directed." Assuming, then, that Apel's authority is sufficiently indicated, the question is whether the injury, under the circumstances, is simply a result of the acts of a fellow servant,—a risk which the plaintiff had assumed,—or of negligence by a vice principal. Undoubtedly the simple fact that Apel was foreman would not cause an injury arising from his merely assisting in the work, entirely independent and apart from any exercise of authority by him, to be imputed to the employer. No decisions of this court, nor of any other, have been called to our attention which preclude the same person acting at different times in different capacities. He might be foreman at one time, and assistant workman at another, and that all on the same day and in the same place, so far as any decisions cited here are concerned. Counsel for the defendant is entirely correct in saying that the decisions of this court do not hold "that the master is liable for the personal act of the foreman wholly disconnected with his duties of supervision." Liability for the acts of a vice principal is, in this state, derived from the authority given him, and, of course, cannot be separated from an exercise of that authority. The question here is whether or not the action of Apel in ordering the plaintiff on the elevator with the trucks, and in himself undertaking the task of lowering him, were so far separate transactions that the latter is to be considered as wholly distinct from the duty of supervision. It would not seem so. If the doctrine of responsibility for the act of the vice principal is to be derived from his authority, it ought to be applied whenever the vice principal's negligence coincides with an exercise of that authority. The position of plaintiff is quite different from that in which he would have been if he had at his own instance, and without specific direction, entered upon the elevator with the trucks, and a fellow workman, or even the foreman himself, had simply volunteered to lower the elevator. He would have been taking the risk himself. Here he was ordered into the elevator with the trucks by the foreman, who is conceded to have had the authority, in fact, and the right to employ and discharge workmen. His refusal would undoubtedly have cost him his place. While carrying out this order he was injured, as the jury find, by the fault of this foreman. The trial court held that under such circumstances the negligence of the foreman is to be deemed the negligence of his employer. In this respect we are unable to distinguish this case from Crystal Ice Co. v. Sherlock, 37 Neb. 19, 55 N. W. 294; Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Smith, 22 Neb. 775, 36 N. W. 285; New Omaha Thomson-Houston Electric Light Co. v. Baldwin (Neb.) 87 N. W. 27. The negligent act was not by any means wholly disconnected with his duties of supervision. It was the direct result of his exercise of those duties in giving orders to, and directing the movements of, plaintiff in connection with his own contemporaneous acts. To hold that the sole cause of the injury was the bad manipulation of the elevator is to ignore a large part of the transaction, and the important part, so far as plaintiff's position is concerned. That manipulation was only a part of the foreman's authoritative arrangements.

There are various errors complained of, in the giving and refusal of instructions, which must be noted. The first is a complaint that the trial court misstated defendant's answer. The statement in paragraph 2 of the instruction is, "Defendant denies that the plaintiff was injured in manner and form as stated in his petition, and denies the alleged lameness of plaintiff, and denies each and every allegation." This instruction, given on the court's own motion, is in accordance with certain refusals of instructions asked by the defendant, which will be considered later. The defendant complains that it indicates a complete denial of any injury to the plaintiff, and any lameness on his part, whereas the answer is a denial that plaintiff was injured as alleged, and a statement "that the alleged lameness and stiffness in his left knee, as well as his suffering in body and mind, is in no wise owing to, or the result of, any injury received by him while going down in said elevator, as set forth in said plaintiff's petition." That this is quite decidedly a different matter from a complete denial that any injury was received, or that any lameness existed at the time of the trial, must be conceded. In some states of the evidence it might be entirely unprejudicial. In this case, however, we find that plaintiff, in his brief, concedes "there was some evidence received, which, if the proper issues had been raised by the answer, might have entitled the defendant to have submitted to the jury the question of the condition of plaintiff's knee prior to the accident, and also whether or not the injury was aggravated by his own conduct."

By instruction No. 10 defendant asked the court to charge that it was the plaintiff's duty to take all reasonable care of the injured knee, and that if he failed to take such care, and conducted himself in a manner to aggravate and enhance the alleged injury, and on account of his failure the injury was increased or enhanced, he was not entitled to damages which resulted from his failure to take such proper and reasonable care. This instruction was refused. It has to be admitted that the matter sought by the above instruction to be laid before the jury was not specifically pleaded. It is claimed on behalf of plaintiff, in the first place, that any error in refusing said instruction was cured by the general instruction on damages given by the court in its No. 5. This instruction was as follows: "You are instructed that, if you find for the plaintiff, you will assess the damages to which you believe him entitled as shown by the evidence. In so doing you should allow him his necessary expenses for treatment of his injuries while in the hospital, and reasonable compensation for his loss of time in consequence of the injuries inflicted upon him, if you find such injuries were inflicted upon him through the carelessness, neglect, or negligence of the defendant, as hereinbefore explained,—a just and reasonable compensation on account of the pain and suffering, if any has been shown by the evidence, caused by said injuries; and if you find from the evidence that the plaintiff's injuries are permanent, and that a partial disability, resulting from those injuries, will continue in the future, you may allow plaintiff something, also, on account of such future disability, taking care that such allowance is just and reasonable, and supported by a preponderance of the evidence." This instruction, it will be observed, while very clearly stated, and placing the proper elements of damages distinctly before the jury, contains no exception as to aggravation by plaintiff's carelessness, or as to the consideration of his previous condition. We do not see how this instruction No. 5, while admittedly correct in stating the positive elements which go to make up the damages in a case of this kind, can be held to take the place of defendant's requested instruction as to the negative elements which it is admitted the evidence in this case developed. Counsel for plaintiff contends that instruction No. 10 was not embraced within the issues; that this matter of subsequent conduct of plaintiff, and of his previous condition, must be specifically pleaded, in order to be available by way of instruction. Of course, if this is true, the evidence was not admissible under the pleadings, and the failure to submit it by instructions cannot be complained of. Union P. R. Co. v. Elliott, 54 Neb. 305, 74 N. W. 627; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Oyster, 58 Neb. 1, 78 N. W. 359, and Union Stock-Yards Co. v. Goodwin, 57 Neb. 138, 77 N. W. 357, are cited to uphold this contention.

All three of these cases are holdings that contributory negligence, as a defense to an action, must be alleged. They are not cases holding that mere proof in reduction of damages must be based upon a specific allegation; nor do they hold that a defendant is not entitled to have the effect of such evidence stated to the jury, in the absence of specific allegations. Instruction No. 10 only asked that the evidence be considered in reduction of damages, and it would seem that evidence for that purpose was competent, and an instruction submitting such evidence to the jury right and proper, without any specific allegation. Such matters are peculiarly within the knowledge of plaintiff. They are liable not to come to defendant's knowledge until the trial, and, if they appear for the first time in the course of it, they are proper matters for the jury's consideration. They would seem to be distinctly part of these matters in mitigation of the injury; rather than of damages actually arising from it, which Greenleaf says may always be shown. 2 Redfield's ed. Greenl. Ev. § 266; Crete v. Childs, 11 Neb. 252, 9 N. W. 55; 1 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 827. The defendant would seem to have the right to have them submitted in a properly drawn instruction for that purpose. This was especially true in connection with the version of defendant's answer which was given by the trial court to the jury. The instruction given, with the refusal of the one requested by defendant, would indicate that the court's view was either the one now taken by the plaintiff's counsel, that the matter was not in issue, or else one which the plaintiff's brief admits was wrong, namely, that there was no evidence to support it. It would seem that there was error, and error liable to be prejudicial, in the two, taken together.

The other complaints of both instructions given and those refused are based upon the defendant's assumption that the injury was the result of Apel's personal act, and not the result of any act of himself as foreman; and, as we have not deemed that contention well taken, it is not necessary to consider them further.

Complaint is made because of the refusal of the trial court to permit defendant to prove that the falling of the elevator five floors would have resulted in the breaking of its frame. It was objected to as incompetent, and it must be said that there is no showing that the witness knew anything more about that part of the matter than the jurors themselves might be presumed to know. Whether opinion evidence should be taken on this subject at all was probably discretionary with the court, but, at all events, the qualification of the witness is not shown to have been such that his answers would have been valuable.

Complaint is made of the misconduct of two of the jurors in taking notes of the evidence at the trial. We are not prepared to say that this was misconduct, in and of itself. It is difficult to conceive how this could have happened to any great extent in a public trial without coming to a diligent defendant's knowledge, and if it did, of course, error would be waived if no objection was taken. In some of the states, taking notes by jurors is expressly authorized by statute. It does not seem to be necessarily prejudicial. It is not claimed that any prejudicial circumstances, beyond the bare fact that two of the jurors took shorthand notes of greater or less extent, is shown. From the affidavit of one of the note takers and of other jurors, the trial court would have been amply warranted in finding that shorthand notes were taken by Smith and Weinberger, but were not read or referred to in the jury room. This would not, in our opinion, call for a reversal of the case.

The complaint of prejudice on the part of the juror Adams it is not necessary to discuss, as he cannot serve again on this case.

For the error in telling the jury that defendant denied the lameness, and in refusing to instruct that defendant was not responsible for any additional injury caused by plaintiff's own carelessness and neglect of reasonable subsequent precautions, the cause should be reversed. It is therefore recommended that the cause be reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

Day and Kirkpatrick, CC., concur.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

- *1. Tax levied on real estate for general revenue purposes, or by way of special assessment for benefits received on account of local improvements, is not a debt, in the ordinary meaning of the word, against the owner of the property, to be enforced as a personal liability, but a charge upon the real estate against which assessed, to be enforced and collected by a sale of the property liable for the taxes so levied and assessed.
2. By reason of the provision of § 144, art. 1, chap. 77, Comp. Stat. 1901, an injunction will not be granted to restrain the collection of taxes, unless the assessment is void, or levied for an illegal or unauthorized purpose.

3. Ordinarily the rule of estoppel in pais will not be held applicable to the acts of municipal officers in the exercise of governmental agencies of the municipality of which they are public agents; and where a city treasurer erroneously and by mistake marked on the tax records of his office that certain taxes levied on real estate were "paid," and a third party, relying on, and in faith of, the record so erroneously made, loaned money and acquired title to the land, believing the taxes assessed thereon were paid,—Held, that the rule of equitable estoppel did not apply as against the municipality, and that it could not by injunction be restrained from enforcing the collection of the taxes actually due and unpaid, which had been lawfully levied and assessed on such property.

On Rehearing.

- †4. It seems that where the agent of a prior lien holder falsely, but without the knowledge of his principal, represents that the lien is satisfied, whereby another is induced to loan money upon mortgage on the property, the result is only to postpone such prior lien to the mortgage, not to extinguish it; and hence if the mortgagee acquires the property by foreclosure, paying less than the amount of the mortgage debt, his remedy on discovering that the prior lien remains unpaid is to foreclose as to such lien, setting up the facts by reason whereof it should be postponed, or to compel the holder thereof to redeem from the mortgage, and not to enjoin all assertion of the lien and cut it off entirely.
5. In consequence of § 144, art. 1, chap. 77, Comp. Stat., an action to quiet title to real property and remove a cloud therefrom, directed against an apparent lien by way of tax or special assessment, is only maintainable in case such tax or assessment itself is absolutely void.
6. If the tax is not wholly void in itself, nor levied or assessed for an unauthorized purpose, a person who claims for some other reason that he or his property should not be held to pay it is left to the remedy provided by § 144, art. 1, chap. 77, Comp. Stat., or to make his defense when the alleged tax lien is sought to be enforced.
7. Whether the doctrine of equitable estoppel may be applied to a municipal corporation acting in its governmental capacity,—quære.

APPREAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Douglas County in favor of defendant in a suit to enjoin the collection of certain taxes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Appellant had a right to rely upon the correctness of the records in the city treasurer's office as to the payment of the taxes in question, and, having acted on the faith of the same, the city is estopped from denying the correctness of said records.

Comp. Stat. 1897, chap. 77, § 108.

The city treasurer, or his lawfully constituted deputy, entered the record of payment as provided by the law. It is a legal presumption that the act of the city treasurer or his deputy in making the record of the payment of the taxes in question was rightfully done.

Tecumseh Town Site Case, 3 Neb. 234.

The fact that the record showed the tax paid was presumptive evidence that it was paid; and the appellant, having no notice of any irregularity in paying the same, had a right to act on that presumption, and, having acted on it in good faith, the city is certainly estopped from denying the payment.

6 Walt, Act. & Def. p. 592.

A municipal corporation may be estopped by the action of its proper officers when acting in its private as contradistinguished from its governmental, capacity, and having lawful power to do the act.

On petition for rehearing.

The duties of the city treasurer in receiving taxes and marking the same "paid" on the records are not governmental, but purely ministerial, duties, and the city, in the performance of those duties, through its treasurer, is not engaged in a governmental or public act.

Messrs. W. J. Connell and Edgar H. Scott for appellee.

Holcomb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff and appellant instituted this action in the court below, in the exercise of its equity jurisdiction, for the purpose of having the title to certain real estate quieted in it, and to compel the defendant city treasurer of Omaha to note on his records the payment of certain taxes appearing against said real estate as being unpaid and an apparent lien thereon, and also to enjoin the defendant treasurer from changing the records after they were made to show and record the fact that the said taxes were paid. The relief sought was based substantially on the following facts which were pleaded in the petition, and the truth of 57 L. R. A.

which sufficiently appears from the entire record before us: At the time of the transaction hereinafter narrated, one Henry Bolln was city treasurer, and had applied to the plaintiff for a loan of money on the real estate involved in this action, of which he was the owner. The loan was negotiated on the faith of the security offered, and, default having been made in the payment of the loan so made and the interest according to the terms of the agreement, such proceedings were thereafter had as resulted in a sale of the mortgaged property, and the purchase of the same by the plaintiff in satisfaction of its mortgage lien thereon, so that it became the owner of the property in fee simple. At the time the loan was negotiated the taxes for municipal purposes assessed and levied on the real estate offered for security for the years 1892 and 1893, and certain instalments of special paving taxes, in all amounting to $258.62, were marked "Paid" on the tax records of the city. The plaintiff negotiated the loan and advanced the money to the borrower, relying on the correctness of the tax records as they thus appeared. The taxes were, in truth and fact, never paid; and subsequent to the transaction resulting in the loan, and prior to the bringing of the present action, the records were altered by the erasure of the word "Paid," so that the taxes again appeared as unpaid, and an apparent lien on the property against which assessed and levied. On these facts the trial court found the plaintiff's bill was without equity, and that it was not entitled to the relief sought, and dismissed the action. From the decree of dismissal the cause is brought to this court by appeal.

It is agreed by all the parties interested, as we understand the record, that the entry on the tax records showing payment of the taxes was a mistake, and that the taxes so recorded as being paid were never in fact paid into the city treasury, and that the records ought not to have been so marked. At all events, there is no shadow of claim put forth by appellant to the effect that the taxes have ever been paid. The law provides that whenever taxes are paid the treasurer shall write on the tax lists, opposite the description of the real estate or personal property whereon the same were levied, the word "Paid," together with the date of such payment, and the name of the person paying the same. Section 108, art. 1, chap. 77, Comp. Stat. 1901. And it is the contention of the appellant that the law presumes that a public officer does his duty, and, the record showing the taxes to have been paid, it will be presumed the entry of payment was rightly made, and that, in any event, the city is estopped from enforcing the taxes so marked "Paid," as against the land on which levied, and afterward purchased by plaintiff, because of its having made the loan mentioned and parted with its money relying on and in good faith of the record as it then appeared, showing all of the taxes mentioned to have been paid. The problem thus presented is an interesting one, and, were the transactions such as to affect only private individuals, or corporations acting in their corporate capacity as an individual, we would not regard it as difficult of solution. We are, however, constrained to the view that because of the nature and quality of the act relied on to operate as an estoppel, and a proper application of the statutes relating to the public revenues and the manner of their collection, an altogether different question is presented from that first suggested. The plaintiff asks, in effect, that the tax records be changed from their present condition, so as to show all of the taxes mentioned in the petition to have been paid; that it be decreed that such taxes are not a lien on the real estate against which they were assessed; and that the defendant city and its treasurer be forever restrained from enforcing or attempting to enforce the collection of such taxes as against the real estate, the title to which, free from any lien by reason of such taxes, it is sought to have quieted in the plaintiff. The relief demanded is shocking to a court whose conscience is appealed to, since it is obvious that the record thus made under compulsion would be a false one, and deprive the city of the collection of some of its revenues to which it is lawfully entitled. Let us see what the effect of a decree of the kind prayed for would be. The special assessments and the taxes assessed and levied for municipal general revenue purposes are a charge upon and against the particular tracts of land on which assessed, and, unless the real estate can be made to respond to the charges thus made, the taxes cannot be collected, although lawfully levied and justly due, and the city must lose all right thereto. It is suggested in the brief of counsel for appellant that the collection of these taxes may be enforced against Bolin, the owner of the real estate at the time they were levied. But this cannot be, under the laws of this state. It will hardly be contended by any, we assume, that a special assessment levied solely on the ground of benefits to the property assessed, and on the theory that, for the benefits received because of local improvements, special assessments to correspond to the benefits received may rightfully be made a charge against the property, can be converted into a just and legal demand in personam, against the owner of the fee. The law authorizes the taxation of property specially benefited by reason of local improvements, but not the taxation of the owner of such property. On taxes levied on real estate for general revenue purposes this court has more than once held that the tax was not a debt, in the ordinary meaning of the word, against the owner of the property, to be enforced as a personal liability, but a charge upon the real estate against which assessed, to be enforced and collected by a sale of the property liable for the taxes so levied and assessed. Grant v. Bartholomew, 57 Neb. 673, 78 N. W. 314; Carman v. Harris, 61 Neb. 635, 85 N. W. 848.

If our conclusions in respect of the matter last discussed are correct, then it must follow that the ultimate object and purpose to be accomplished by these proceedings are permanently to restrain the collection of the taxes assessed against the property involved in the controversy, although it is conceded that the taxes are in all respects valid, and legally due to the municipality to which they are owing. By § 144, art. 1, chap. 77, of the Compiled Statutes of 1901, it is provided that no injunction shall be granted by any court or judge in this state to restrain the collection of any tax, or any part thereof, except the tax enjoined be levied or assessed for an illegal or an unauthorized purpose. These provisions are to be given the effect the language used, expressive of the legislative intent, fairly warrants; and the uniform holdings of this court have been that unless the assessment is void, or levied for an illegal or an unauthorized purpose, injunction cannot be resorted to in order to prevent the enforcement of the collection of such taxes. South Platte Land Co. v. Crete, 11 Neb. 344, 7 N. W. 859; Wilson v. Auburn, 27 Neb. 435, 43 N. W. 257; Thatcher v. Adams County, 19 Neb. 485, 27 N. W. 729; Spargur v. Romine, 38 Neb. 736, 57 N. W. 523; Bellevue Improv. Co. v. Bellevue, 39 Neb. 885, 58 N. W. 446; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Cass County, 51 Neb. 369, 70 N. W. 955. In Bellevue Improv. Co. v. Bellevue, 39 Neb. 885, 58 N. W. 446, it is stated in the opinion of the court: "In many states, courts of equity interfere to restrain the enforcement of invalid taxes upon real estate upon the ground that they cast a cloud upon plaintiff's title, but an inspection of the decisions of this court shows that this principle has not been here recognized. This feature has existed in each of the cases where relief has been refused upon the general ground that no established rule of equity jurisprudence has been invoked to sustain the suit." The case at bar does not commend itself as coming within any established equitable principles justifying the relief asked, unless it be on the ground of estoppel, which will be noticed hereafter. Counsel for appellant insists that it is not sought to enjoin the collection of the taxes assessed against the property which it is desired to have released from the lien thereof, but only to have the apparent lien removed, and that the city is yet at liberty to proceed and collect the taxes in any manner it may adopt, except by proceedings against the real property on which assessed. It is obvious, from an inspection of the revenue laws and the decisions heretofore cited, that the assessments must be collected, if at all, from the property alone liable therefor, and that a suit against the person owning the land at the time of the assessment is unauthorized. It then appears that, as to the equities in the case in favor of or against the respective parties, the question is whether the municipality shall lose the taxes lawfully assessed against the property described in the plaintiff's petition, or be permitted to enforce the collection of the amount due notwithstanding the error made by one of its officers or agents, and leave the plaintiff to his remedy against those responsible for the mistake which led the plaintiff to take the action it did. The plaintiff answers the question by saying that the doctrine of estoppel in pais applies, and the city, because of the erroneous action of one of its agents, on the faith of which plaintiff acted, is prohibited from asserting or enforcing any lien it may have had for the payment of such taxes. Counsel for appellant, in their brief, say: "A municipal corporation may be estopped by the action of its proper officers, when acting in its private as contradistinguished from its governmental, capacity, and having lawful power to do the act." Conceding the proposition thus enunciated to be correct, can it be said that the act of the city treasurer in erroneously noting on the tax records of a municipality that certain taxes were paid, when, as a matter of fact, they were not, is the act of the corporation in its private or individual capacity and not one pertaining to the government of its affairs? It is frequently said that a municipality has a double character,—one, governmental, legislative, or public; and the other, proprietary or private. Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 86. The authority to assess property, collect taxes, and make disbursements thereof is founded solely and exclusively on the theory that it is essentially a part of the machinery of government, necessary to maintain its existence for the benefit of the public; and it would seem to follow as a natural deduction that the agencies employed in respect of such matters, including the agency authorized to collect the taxes levied for public purposes, exercise powers of a public and governmental character. If correct in the statement just made, then it follows, according to the rule advanced by plaintiff, that the action taken by one of the public officers of the corporation, which is relied on to operate as an estoppel, was not an act of the corporation, in its private or proprietary character, and hence the doctrine invoked is not applicable. The reasons for the distinction have been recognized and applied by this court in an action wherein it was sought to establish the liability of a city for the negligent acts of one of its servants and employees, committed while in the performance of his duties as an agent or servant of the municipality. Gillespie v. Lincoln, 35 Neb. 34, 18 L. R. A. 349, 52 N. W. 811. It is there held, in substance, that the exception to the general rule as to liability is based upon a public policy which subordinates private interests only to the welfare of the public generally, and we apprehend that this is the underlying and distinguishing principle as to the law of estoppel when it is invoked against a city for the erroneous acts of one of its officers engaged in the management of some branch of the governmental affairs of the municipality. For reasons as potent as those relieving a city from liability because of the negligent acts of its officers, it would seem estoppel cannot be predicated on or arise from acts of negligence or mistake by an agent of the corporation while in the discharge of the governmental affairs of the municipality. If the rule can be invoked by reason of such errors or mistakes, then, indeed, would the public welfare be seriously menaced, and the ability of the corporation to perform its public functions in many instances dangerously crippled. The correct rule, therefore, is, and should be, that the doctrine can be appealed to effectively, as against a municipal corporation, only when it is acting in its private, as contradistinguished from the public or governmental, capacity. There may be, and probably are, exceptions to the rule stated, as when a municipality has gained a clear and decided advantage by the act relied on to operate as an estoppel, when equity will prevent it from retaining the advantage, and at the same time denying its binding force. In the present case, it is to be borne in mind, nothing of advantage has been gained by the city by the erroneous and mistaken action of its city treasurer, and that the success of the plaintiff can result only in a corresponding loss to the city.

The authorities are, we think, quite uniform in support of the proposition that the doctrine cannot ordinarily be invoked to defeat a municipality in the prosecution of its public affairs because of an error or mistake of one of its agents or officers which has been relied upon by a third party to his detriment. In the case of People v. Brown, 67 Ill. 435, it is stated in the headnotes that "public policy, to prevent loss to the state through the negligence of public officers, forbids the application of the doctrine of estoppel to the state, growing out of the conduct and representations of its officers. On the same ground that the government is excused from the consequence of laches, it should not be affected by the negligence, or even wilfulness, of any of its officers." Says Mr. Justice Breese, who delivered the opinion of the court: "It is a familiar doctrine that the state is not embraced within the statute of limitations, unless specially named, and, by analogy, would not fall within the doctrine of estoppel. Its rights, revenues, and property would be at fearful hazard, should this doctrine be applicable to a state. A great and overshadowing public policy of preserving these rights, revenues, and property from injury and loss by the negligence of public officers, forbids the application of the doctrine. If it can be applied in this case, where a comparatively small amount is involved, it must be applied where millions are involved, thus threatening the very existence of the government. The doctrine is well settled that no laches can be imputed to the government, and by the same reasoning which excuses it from laches, and on the same grounds, it should not be affected by the negligence, or even wilfulness, of any one of its officials." In Chicago v. Sexton, 115 Ill. 230, 2 N. E. 263, upon the subject of estoppel as to a municipal corporation, the rule is stated in the opinion as follows: "We hold, simply, that a municipal corporation may be estopped by the action of its proper officers, when the corporation is acting in its private, as contradistinguished from its governmental, capacity, and has lawful power to do the act." See also authorities bearing generally on the proposition: Martel v. East St. Louis, 94 Ill. 67; Ast v. Jackson School Twp. 90 Ind. 101; Berry v. Bickford, 63 N. H. 328; Sievers v. San Francisco, 115 Cal. 648, 47 Pac. 687. A case somewhat related to the one at bar is reported in [Kuhl v. Jersey City], 23 N. J. Eq. 84, wherein a party purchased land relying on the fact of payment of the taxes levied on the same, to evidence which the proper officer had issued a receipt for the taxes, which appeared afterward had not been actually paid; and, on an application for an injunction, it was held that the doctrine of estoppel did not apply, and the injunction was therefore denied. While the reasoning employed does not commend itself to us, the result reached is in harmony with the general trend of authority. Counsel for appellant cite us some authorities holding that by an injunction a municipality will be restrained from enforcing tax liens on the ground of estoppel, but in each of the two cases cited the sole question considered was that of enforcement of the lien, and not the collection of the taxes, as must be the result in the case at bar if the relief prayed for is granted. The equities of the appellant in the present case are not such as to entitle it to an injunction restraining the collection of the taxes lawfully assessed against the property it now owns, nor can the doctrine of estoppel in pais be successfully invoked to accomplish that result.

It follows that the decree of the District Court should be affirmed, which is accordingly done.

A rehearing having been granted, Pound, C., on June 4, 1902, filed the following additional opinion:

This is a rehearing. The facts are stated in the former opinion (Philadelphia Mortg. & T. Co. v. Omaha), but may be stated briefly as follows: One Bolln, city treasurer of the defendant municipality, obtained a loan of plaintiff secured by mortgage upon real property. At that time the taxes upon the property for certain years and certain instalments of special assessments thereon were marked "Paid" on the tax records of the city, as required by law when such taxes or assessments are collected. The plaintiff afterwards became owner of the property through foreclosure of its mortgage. In fact, the taxes had not been paid, and we may take it that the false entry upon the records was a fraud upon the city as well as upon the mortgagee. After plaintiff took its mortgage, the word "Paid" was erased, and the taxes and assessments once more appeared as liens upon the property. Thereupon plaintiff brought this suit to quiet its title, remove the cloud thereon by reason of the taxes and assessments, and require said taxes and assessments to be noted as paid upon the records. The district court dismissed the suit, and its decree was affirmed at the former hearing.

We think the judgment of affirmance was right, and should be adhered to. The taxes themselves are conceded to be regular and valid in every respect, and to be unpaid; but plaintiff asserts an estoppel by reason of the condition of the city's records when it made the loan, and claims that the city should not be permitted to erase the entries and claim a lien afterwards to the prejudice of a mortgagee in good faith who took in reliance on such records. Plaintiff bought in the property under its decree of foreclosure for less than the amount found due on its lien. Hence we may treat it, with respect to other lienholders not parties to the foreclosure, as in the position of mortgagee rather than purchaser, since it paid nothing beyond the credit on the mortgage debt. Stated in general terms, plaintiff's case amounts to this: The agent of a prior lienholder falsely, but without the knowledge of his principal, represented that the lien was satisfied, whereby plaintiff was induced to loan money upon mortgage on the property. It would seem, under such circumstances, that the estoppel should extend only to postponing such prior lien to the plaintiff's mortgage lien. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 731, 732. The requirements of justice would be met fully by permitting or requiring the holder of the tax lien to redeem. It is not necessary to wipe it out utterly in order to protect the mortgagee. Plaintiff might maintain a suit to foreclose against the tax lien, so long as it was not involved in the first suit, compelling its holder to redeem from the mortgage or confining its operation to any surplus that might remain after satisfaction thereof. Shaw v. Heisey, 48 Iowa, 468; State Bank v. Abbott, 20 Wis. 570; Foster v. Johnson, 44 Minn. 200, 46 N. W. 350; Robinson v. Ryan, 25 N. Y. 320. Instead, plaintiff seeks to cut the tax lien off entirely. We do not think such course just or equitable, and doubt whether a suit of this character would be maintainable under the circumstances, in view of the ordinary rule that he who seeks equity must do equity.

If this objection did not exist, however, there is another and insuperable difficulty in § 144, art. 1, chap. 77, Comp. Stat. By whatever name called, any suit which has for its real end the enjoining of a tax or special assessment is within the purview of that section. Otherwise, the statute would be deprived continually of all force or efficacy by very trivial exercises of professional ingenuity. If a tax or assessment is absolutely void in itself, so as to be no tax, but a mere pretense under color whereof rights are affected and titles clouded, an action to quiet title and remove the cloud is maintainable. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Cass County, 51 Neb. 369, 70 N. W. 955; Touzalín v. Omaha, 25 Neb. 817, 41 N. W. 796. As was said in the latter case: "A void tax is no tax. How, then, can the statute debar the taxpayer from enjoining the unlawful sale of his property to pay such alleged taxes?"

But here the taxes themselves are valid, and they were not levied or assessed for an unauthorized purpose. Plaintiff's contention is that for other reasons it ought not to pay them, and they ought not to be held a lien on its lands. Such claims come fairly within the scope and purpose of § 144, and afford no ground for injunction or proceedings in equity tantamount thereto. If the tax is not wholly void in itself, nor levied or assessed for an unauthorized purpose, one who claims for some other reason that he or his property should not be held to pay it is left to the remedy provided by said § 144, or to make his defense when the alleged tax lien is sought to be enforced. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Cass County, 51 Neb. 369, 70 N. W. 955; Bellevue Improv. Co. v. Bellevue, 39 Neb. 885, 58 N. W. 446; Spargur v. Romine, 38 Neb. 736, 57 N. W. 523.

Hence we do not think it necessary to decide whether or how far the doctrine of equitable estoppel may be applied to a municipal corporation acting in its governmental capacity, nor whether the acts here in controversy are to be put in that category. The former opinion states the arguments, and cites the cases in support thereof, whereby it is contended that the doctrine does not apply. On the other hand, it might be argued that though courts cannot judge between sovereign and subjects as of course, when the sovereign comes into court or permits itself to be sued courts must apply the ordinary principles of law and justice as in other cases. It might be urged that equitable estoppel, rightly understood and administered, is as essential to just determination of causes as a defense of payment or denial of a plaintiff's claim. It might be urged that it is of the essence of justice to have a universal standard, and that there should not be one standard for the state and one for the citizen. The authorities directly in point on either side are few, and the question must be determined by principle and analogy. It is too important to be settled by mere dictum, and ought to be left open. Conceding all that the plaintiff asserts as to the force and scope of its claim of estoppel, the action by which it seeks to avail itself thereof is not maintainable. We recommend that the former judgment be adhered to.

Barnes and Oldham, CC., concur.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the former judgment of this court is adhered to and the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Subject to certain exceptions hereafter referred to, it is unquestionably a general principle of international and interstate law that the validity of a marriage, so far as it depends upon the preliminaries, and the manner or mode of its celebration or solemnization, is to be determined by reference to the law of the place where it was celebrated or solemnized.

The general rule of law is that a marriage valid where it is celebrated is valid everywhere; and the converse of this proposition is equally general,—that a marriage void where it is celebrated is void everywhere. Hutchins v. Kimball, 31 Mich. 126, 18 Am. Rep. 164; Phillips v. Gregg, 10 Watts, 158, 36 Am. Dec. 158.

The validity of a marriage entered into in the state of Indiana must be determined by the laws of that state, although the question arises in Kentucky. Dumaresny v. Flashy, 3 A. K. Marsh. 368.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Brome & Burnett and Martin H. Leamy for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. F. N. Prout, Attorney General, and Norris Brown, for defendant in error:

Bigamy is a crime against the wife, and not against the "relation."

ligation, and by the law and practice of all civilized nations a marriage valid by the law of the place where it is entered into is binding everywhere. Harding v. Alden, 9 Me. 140, 23 Am. Dec. 540. The court said that this was the rule, even where the parties were domiciled in one jurisdiction and went into another jurisdiction with a view to evade the law of the former, holding that the decision in Robinson v. Bland, 2 Burr. 1077, to the contrary, was against the weight of authority.

Smith v. Smith, 52 N. J. L. 207, 19 Atl. 255, infra, also says that the intent to evade the law of the domicile is immaterial.

And a marriage must be proved according to what would be the proof of it where it took place. Patterson v. Gaines, 6 How. 550, 12 L. ed. 553.

So, a marriage valid where celebrated is valid everywhere. Fornhill v. Murray, 1 Bland, Ch. 479, 18 Am. Dec. 344; Corrie's Case, 2 Bland, Ch. 489; Jackson v. Jackson, 82 Md. 17, 34 L. R. A. 773, 33 Atl. 317; King v. Brampton, 10 East, 282; Herbert v. Herbert, 2 Hagg. Const. 263.

Thus, a marriage per verba de presenti, without religious or other ceremony, if valid where celebrated, is, in general, valid everywhere. Meister v. Moore, 96 U. S. 76, 24 L. ed. 820; Jackson v. Jackson, 82 Md. 17, 34 L. R. A. 773, 33 Atl. 317; Clark v. Clark, 52 N. J. Eq. 650, 30 Atl. 81; Smith v. Smith, 52 N. J. L. 207, 19 Atl. 255; Hynes v. McDermott, 82 N. Y. 41, 37 Am. Rep. 538.

And, in accordance with this principle, it was held that marriages in Scotland per verba de presenti, without religious or other ceremony, prior to 19 and 20 Vict. chap. 96, between persons domiciled in England, would be recognized in England, notwithstanding that they would have been invalid if celebrated in England. Ilderton v. Ilderton, 2 H. Bl. 145; Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 2 Hagg. Const. 54; Bell v. Graham, 13 Moore, P. C. C. 242, 1 L. T. N. S. 221, 8 Week. Rep. 98; Dysart Peerage Case, L. R. 6 App. Cas. 489.

So, in Rooker v. Rooker, 3 Swabey & T. 526, 33 L. J. Mat. N. S. 42, 9 Jur. N. S. 1320, 12 Week. Rep. 807, it was assumed that the mere cohabitation in a foreign country of a man and woman who proclaimed themselves, and were received in society, as man and wife, would constitute a marriage, which would be recognized as valid in England, if valid according to the law of the country where the acts occurred.

Whitman v. State, 17 Neb. 224, 22 N. W. 459; Hodgkins v. State, 36 Neb. 160, 54 N. W. 86.

On the theory that the communication to Young was not received by him as a priest of the church under the pledge of secrecy, and that it was a voluntary statement not prompted by hope of reward,—a theory abundantly supported by the record,—it was clearly admissible.

Langtry v. State, 30 Ala. 536; Halbrook v. State, 34 Ark. 511, 36 Am. Rep. 17; State v. Johnson, 12 Minn. 476, Gil. 378, 93 Am. Dec. 241; State v. Sanders, 30 Iowa, 582; Wolverton v. State, 16 Ohio, 173, 47 Am. Dec. 373; Squire v. State, 46 Ind. 459.

On indictment for bigamy the first marriage may be proved by the admission of the prisoner, and it is for the jury to say whether what he said was an admission that he was actually and legally married accord-in that state, the husband, however, being a subject of the Kingdom of Wurtemberg, is valid and binding in Illinois, notwithstanding that it was in violation of a law of such Kingdom declaring all such marriages in a foreign state, without the license of the sovereign, absolutely null and void. Roth v. Roth, 104 Ill. 35, 44 Am. Rep. 81. The court admitted, however, that while such law had no extraterritorial effect, yet upon the return of the parties to the Kingdom of Wurtemberg, the law might properly be enforced against them by the courts of that country in the same manner and to the same extent as if their infraction had occurred within the Kingdom.

In Re Willbur, 8 Wash. 35, 35 Pac. 407, the court, while denying the validity of a marriage between a white man domiciled in Washington, and an Indian woman, celebrated within an Indian reservation, held that if both parties had been Indians the marriage would undoubtedly have been upheld, although there was no ceremony other than the mere selling of the woman to the husband by her father, and the subsequent cohabitation of the parties, and notwithstanding that the relations which were thus created were not attended by any such circumstances as would have amounted to a common-law marriage.

A marriage valid according to the laws of the state where it took place will be recognized as valid in Nebraska under the express provision of Neb. Comp. Stat. chap. 52, § 1, that "all marriages contracted without this state, which would be valid by the law of the country in which the same were contracted, shall be valid in all courts and places in this state." Gibson v. Gibson, 24 Neb. 394, 39 N. W. 450.

And, in general, though the rule is subject to a number of exceptions, a marriage invalid where celebrated is invalid everywhere.

Thus, Lord Hardwicke said in Butler v. Freeman, 1 Amb. 301, with reference to a marriage in Antwerp, of British citizens, according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England, that such marriage would not be held valid in England unless it was so by the laws of the country where it was celebrated.

A marriage between English subjects, celebrated abroad, will not be recognized as valid in England where it would be null and void according to the law of the country where it was celebrated, on account of the incompetency of the minister who celebrated the same, the minority of one of the parties, or the want of publication of banns. Middleton v. Janverin, 2 Hagg. Const. 437.

ing to the laws of the country where the marriage was solemnized.

Miles v. United States, 103 U. S. 304, 26 L. ed. 481; Com. v. Henning, 10 Phila. 209.

There was a marriage contract and a marriage ceremony. The agreement to keep it secret was not a pretense, and could not avoid or invalidate it. Any agreement that it should not be binding and valid, before it was made, could not affect its validity after the ceremony was performed.

Schouler, Husb. & W. §§ 38, 39.

Norval, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a prosecution for bigamy. A verdict of guilty was returned, and the defendant was sentenced to the penitentiary for the term of four years. The complaint before the examining magistrate was signed and sworn to by Eliza C. Hills, the first wife of the defendant. His counsel filed a plea in abatement to the complaint on the ground that Eliza C. Hills was not a competent witness against accused, which was overruled, and the magistrate, finding probable cause to believe that defendant was guilty of the crime of bigamy as charged, held the accused to the district court where the county attorney filed an information charging the offense substantially in the language of the complaint. The defendant presented to the district court a plea in abatement, based on the same ground as that incorporated in the one filed before the examining magistrate. A demurrer by the state to this plea was sustained, and a general demurrer to the information was overruled. On the trial, Mrs. Eliza C. Hills, over the objection of the defendant, was examined, and testified as a witness on behalf of the state.

The first contention of counsel for defend-

In Lacon v. Higgins, 3 Starkie, 178, Dowl. & R. N. P. 38, a marriage celebrated in France was held invalid because it was not contracted according to the legal ceremonies which were essential to a valid marriage in that country. It does not appear, in this case, where the parties were domiciled at the time of the marriage, but the decision is apparently broad enough to cover any case irrespective of the domicile of the parties.

It is a general rule that a marriage invalid where it is celebrated is invalid everywhere. The only exceptions to this rule relate to parties sojourning in a foreign country, who may, in certain cases, contract a valid marriage without celebrating it according to the local requirements. Canale v. People, 177 Ill. 219, 52 N. E. 310. In this case a marriage celebrated in Italy, between persons domiciled there, was held invalid because the parties were under the age fixed by the law of Italy, and the formal requirements of that law were not complied with.

A marriage in China, according to its laws, is valid in the United States, although the husband was domiciled within the United States, and was within the United States at the time of the ceremony. Re Lum Lin Ying, 59 Fed. 682. In this case it was proved that, according to the law of China, the presence of the bridegroom was not essential to a marriage. The court was in doubt whether the marriage could be regarded as having been solemnized in China, under the circumstances, but did not decide the question, and did not actually pass upon its validity.

Exceptions.

Excluding matters affecting the matrimonial capacity of the parties, and matters affecting the nature and vital character of the relation created by the marriage, there seem to be no exceptions to the principle that a marriage valid where celebrated is valid everywhere. It is true that it was held in Holmes v. Holmes, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 525, Fed. Cas. No. 6,638, and Norman v. Norman, 121 Cal. 620, 42 L. R. A. 343, 54 Pac. 143, that a marriage celebrated on the high seas, between persons domiciled in California, who resorted there for the express purpose of evading the California statute prescribing the manner in which marriages should be contracted and solemnized, would not be recognized as valid; but these decisions are expressly upon the ground that the place where the marriage was celebrated was not subject to the jurisdiction of any state or country. In the latter case it was said that the law of the high seas, as it may relate to the marriage of citizens of the United States domiciled in California, cannot be referred to the common law of England any more than it can to the law of France or Spain, or any other foreign country.

The converse of the foregoing proposition, however, namely, that a marriage invalid where celebrated is invalid everywhere, is subject to certain exceptions affecting even the formalities of celebration or solemnization. Thus, Phillips v. Gregg, 10 Watts, 158, 36 Am. Dec. 158, after stating the general rule that a marriage invalid where celebrated is invalid everywhere, said there were certain well-recognized exceptions to the rule, among others, marriages celebrated in foreign countries by citizens entitling themselves, under certain circumstances, to the benefit of the laws of their own country. See also Canale v. People, 177 Ill. 219, 52 N. E. 310, supra, where similar language was used.

In Ruding v. Smith, 2 Hagg. Const. 390, the court said: "It is true, indeed, that English decisions have established this rule, that a foreign marriage, valid according to the law of the place where celebrated, is good everywhere else; but they have not, e converso, established that marriages of British subjects, not good according to the general law of the place where celebrated, are universally, and under all possible circumstances, to be regarded as invalid in England. It is therefore certainly to be advised that the safest course is always to be married according to the law of the country, for then no question can be stirred; but if this cannot be done on account of legal or religious difficulties, the law of this country does not say that its subjects shall not marry abroad. And even in cases where no difficulties of that insuperable magnitude exist, yet, if a contrary practice has been sanctioned by long acquiescence and acceptance of the one country that has silently permitted such marriages, and of the other that has silently accepted them, the courts of this country, I presume, would not incline to shake their validity upon these large and general theories, encountered, as they are, by numerous exceptions in the practice of nations."

The foregoing case upheld the validity, in England, of a marriage celebrated between British subjects at the Cape of Good Hope, by a chaplain of the British army then occupying that settlement under capitulation, notwithstanding that the parties did not obtain the consent of their parents, as was required by the Dutch law. Several possible grounds for the ant is that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer to the plea in abatement, since the information was based on a complaint verified by the first wife of the accused. The argument is that Mrs. Hills was an incompetent witness against her husband in a prosecution for bigamy, and therefore was disqualified from swearing to the complaint. Section 331 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that "the husband can in no case be a witness against the wife, nor the wife against the husband, except in a criminal proceeding for a crime committed by the one against the other, but they may in all criminal prosecutions be witnesses for each other." This provision was under consideration in Lord v. State, 17 Neb. 526, 23 N. W. 507, where it was distinctly ruled that a wife was a competent witness against her husband on an indictment for adultery, since that was a crime committed by the latter against the former. This holding was cited with approval in Owens v. State, 32 Neb. 174, 49 N. W. 226. See State v. Bennett, 31 Iowa, 24; State v. Hazen, 39 Iowa, 648; State v. Sloan, 55 Iowa, 219, 7 N. W. 516; State v. Hughes, 58 Iowa, 165, 11 N. W. 700. There are authorities—some of which are cited in the brief of counsel for defendant—which affirm the doctrine that a statutory provision like our § 331, quoted above, is merely declaratory of the common law, and that neither a husband nor a wife is a competent witness in a criminal cause against the other, except in cases of personal violence the one upon the other. To this latter view we are unable to assent. The statute in question was not simply declaratory of what the law would be without § 331. To so hold would be to impute to the legisdecision were suggested in the opinion, but the decision was expressly limited to cases including the same elements as the case at bar, namely, the British character of the parties; their independence of the Dutch law in their own British transactions; the insuperable difficulties of obtaining any marriage conformable to the Dutch law, because of the practical impossibility of applying for the consent of the parents owing to the fact that they were at a distance; the countenance given by the British authorities and British ministration and the fact the the whole country was under British dominion.

Other exceptions are illustrated by the following cases:

A marriage between an English woman and a domiciled French man, at the house of the British ambassador at Paris, by the chaplain to the embassy, is a valid marriage under the statute 4 George IV. chap. 91. Lloyd v. Petitjean, 2 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 251.

So, in Este v. Smyth, 18 Beav. 112, 23 L. J. Ch. N. S. 703, 18 Jur. 300, it was held that a marriage of persons domiciled in England, celebrated in the chapel of the British ambassador at Paris, in such a manner as to be a valid marriage according to the law of England, would be regarded as a valid marriage in England, irrespective of the question whether or not it was valid according to the law of France.

In Kent v. Burgess, 11 Sim. 361, 5 Jur. 166, a marriage between persons domiciled in England, celebrated in the presence of the British consul, and in the English church at Antwerp, before a clergyman of the Church of England who had been appointed chaplain to the church and was paid by the British government, was held to be invalid because certain ceremonies prescribed by the law of Belgium had not been observed. It was held that the case did not come within 4 George IV. chap. 91, which provides for the case of a marriage solemnized by a minister of the Church of England, in the chapel or house of any British ambassador or minister residing within the country to the court of which he is accredited, or in the chapel belonging to any British factory abroad, or in a house of any British subject residing at such factory. The case was distinguished from Ruding v. Smith upon the ground that in that case insuperable difficulties existed in effecting a marriage according to Dutch law, while in the case at bar there was no such difficulty.

In Petrrels v. Tondear, 1 Hagg. Const. 136, it was held that a marriage celebrated in England, without banns or license, could not be held valid because it took place within the chapel of the Bavarian ambassador, neither of the parties being of the ambassador's country, nor of his household.

In Loring v. Thorndike, 5 Allen, 257, a marriage before the United States consul in the free city of Frankfurt, between a citizen of Massachusetts and a citizen of the Grand Duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, was held valid, although the provisions of the local law were not complied with. The decision, however, is not upon the ground that the marriage, having taken place before the United States consul, must be regarded as having been celebrated on American territory, but upon the ground that the preponderance of evidence showed that the requirements of the local law of Frankfurt did not apply to foreigners, and that the marriage would be recognized as valid by the authorities of that city.

In Re Hall, 61 App. Div. 266, 70 N. Y. Supp. 406, it was held that, even upon the assumption that a marriage between a woman, a citizen of the United States, and a man, a citizen of the Argentine Republic, in France without compliance with the requirements of the Civil Code as to domicile, publication, consent of parents, and celebration before a civil officer, was contracted at a consulate, the marriage could not be upheld as a common-law marriage, it being invalid both by the laws of France and the laws of the Argentine Republic, the domicile of the husband.

In Waldegrave Peerage Case, 4 Clark & F. 649, the House of Lords held that the marriage of an officer, celebrated by a chaplain of the British army, within the lines of the army when serving abroad, was valid, though the army was not serving in a country in a state of actual hostility, and although no authority for the marriage was previously obtained from the officer's superior in command. This case was governed by a statute.

In Culling v. Culling [1896] P. D. 116, 63 L. J. P. D. & A. N. S. 59, 74 L. T. N. S. 252, a marriage between British subjects, solemnized on a British man-of-war at a foreign station, before a clergyman of the church of England, without a license or publication of banns, was upheld. The marriage in this case seems to have been treated as if it had occurred on English territory.

In Lantour v. Teesdale, 8 Taunt. 830, 2 Marsh. 243, it was held that the validity of a marriage between two British subjects, solemnized by a Catholic priest at Madras was to be determined by the law of England, but this was on the ground that they were a part of the British settlements, and were governed by the laws of England which they carried with them, and were unaffected by the laws of the natives.

lature a useless purpose, since the common law was then in force, except where modified by statute. The lawmaking body evidently, by this section, intended to establish a new rule, and make the husband and wife competent witnesses one against the other in any criminal action for a crime committed by one against the other, whether by the infliction of personal violence or not. The wife is a competent witness against the husband in a criminal prosecution for bigamy or adultery, inasmuch as these are crimes specially against her, and not merely against the relation.

It is strenuously insisted that reversible error was committed in overruling the demurrer to the information. The argument is that the information did not charge a crime, because it did not allege that the first marriage was a lawful one. The information avers that "Rowland P. Hills, on the 11th day of September, 1885, in the county of York, England, then and there being, did then and there marry one Eliza Cook Adsetts, spinster, and her, the said Eliza Cook Adsetts, then and there had for his wife; and the said Rowland P. Hills being so married to the said Eliza Cook Adsetts, afterwards, and during the life of the said Eliza Cook Adsetts, his wife, who had not been continually and wilfully absent from the said Rowland P. Hills and unheard from by him for five years, together, next before the 11th day of March, 1899, did on the 11th day of March, 1899, in the county of Washington and state of Nebraska, then and there, and then and there being, unlawfully, wilfully, and feloniously, marry one Dollie Powell, the said Eliza Cook Adsetts, his former wife, being then alive, etc. The

In Overseers of Poor v. Overseers of Poor, 2 Vt. 151, 19 Am. Dec. 703, it was held that a marriage by capable parties, before a justice of the peace, in the Province of Lower Canada, although such justice was not at the time authorized to celebrate marriages, would nevertheless be upheld as a valid marriage upon the theory that what took place amounted to a marriage per verba de presenti, the ceremony being followed by cohabitation for several years.

In Hynes v. McDermott, 82 N. Y. 41, 37 Am. Rep. 538, in which the validity of a marriage depending upon certain acts, some of which occurred on a vessel crossing the English channel, and some in France, was upheld upon the presumption that the lex loci was the same as the law of New York, the court refrained from passing upon the question whether, if acts which would make a valid marriage when done in New York are done outside its bounds, and not in accordance with the law of the place where done they will create a relation which will be upheld as a valid marriage.

II. Polygamous marriages; temporary marital unions.

The court, in Hyde v. Hyde, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 131, 35 L. J. Mat. N. S. 57, 12 Jur. N. S. 414, 14 L. T. N. S. 188, 14 Week. Rep. 517, announced a principle (which is applicable to the nature of the relation created by, and the character of the contract involved in, marriage, rather than to the form or mode of the solemnization, or the matrimonial capacity of the parties) to the effect that a marriage, wherever celebrated, in order to be entitled to recognition upon the principles of international law, must be a marriage in the sense that that institution is generally understood throughout Christendom,—that is, it must be the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others; and any relation, though termed marriage at the place of its inception, which does not possess such requisites, will not be regarded as a marriage within the principle that a marriage valid where contracted is valid everywhere. In that case it was held that a so-called marriage, contracted in Utah, between persons then domiciled there and professing the faith of the Mormons, which allowed polygamy, would not be recognized as valid in England, and would not support an action for divorce, although it was assumed to be valid in Utah where it was celebrated. Neither of the parties to this marriage had entered into any previous matrimonial alliance, and it was urged that the court might recognize the marriage without countenancing polygamy, but 8; L. R. A.

the court declined to take this view, holding that the marriage was vitiated by the fact that the husband was at liberty to take other wives during its continuance.

The same position was taken in Bethell v. Hildyard, L. R. 38 Ch. Div. 220, 57 L. J. Ch. N. S. 487, 58 L. T. N. S. 674, 36 Week. Rep. 503, where it was held, in an action involving the legitimacy of children of the marriage, that a marriage in South Africa at a place within the control of a semibarbarous tribe of natives, though celebrated according to their custom, would not be recognized as valid in England, because, according to that custom, the husband was at liberty to take subsequent wives. The man, in this case, was a native of England, but was apparently domiciled at the place where the marriage was contracted at the time thereof, and it was the first marriage. It was assumed, in this case, that the marriage would have been recognized as valid in England, if, notwithstanding the custom referred to, the parties had intended to contract a marriage in the Christian sense, but it was held that the evidence did not warrant a finding that such was their intention.

Polygamous marriages are frequently referred to as an exception to the rule that a marriage valid where celebrated is valid everywhere. Thus: Com. v. Lane, 113 Mass. 458, 18 Am. Rep. 509; Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 243, 37 Am. Rep. 321; Hutchins v. Kimmell, 31 Mich. 128, 18 Am. Rep. 164; Jackson v. Jackson, 82 Md. 17, 34 L. R. A. 773, 33 Atl. 317; Campbell v. Crampton, 18 Blatchf. 150, 2 Fed. 417; True v. Ranney, 21 N. H. 52, 53 Am. Rep. 164.

The foregoing cases, however, are all obiter on the point in question, and, with the exception of Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 243, 37 Am. Rep. 321, which apparently approves of the position taken in Hyde v. Hyde, supra, and Com. v. Lane, 113 Mass. 458, 18 Am. Rep. 509, which, on the contrary, states that to bring a marriage within that exception one of the parties to the marriage must have had another husband or wife living, they cannot be cited either for or against the position taken in Hyde v. Hyde, and Bethell v. Hildyard, supra, that a marriage which contemplates polygamy, even if it is a first marriage, will not be recognized as valid though valid according to the lex loci.

In Wall v. Williamson, 8 Ala. 48, the exception of polygamous marriages from the rule that a marriage valid where celebrated is valid everywhere, was held not to apply to an Indian marriage unless there had been a previous marriage by one of the parties. This was apinfirmity imputed to the information is lacking of merit. It is averred that the defendant was married at a specified time to a certain woman in England. This implies that the marriage was a lawful one. If unlawful, then there was no marriage. State v. Hughes, 58 Iowa, 165, 11 N. W. 706.

Rev. A. T. Young, the rector of the Episcopal church at Blair, was called and examined as a witness for the prosecution. His evidence reveals that almost immediately after the arrest of the defendant the latter sent for Rev. Young, who called upon him in the county jail. Hills's object in requesting his presence was to have the rector intercede with his first wife for a settlement of the criminal proceedings. Hills wrote a letter to the county attorney somewhat along the same line, which, at defendant's request, was delivered to the prosecuting attorney by Young. The latter was also prevailed upon by defendant to carry his wishes to his first wife, the prosecuting witness. At the time Hills wrote out a synopsis of what he wanted Rev. Young to say to Mrs. Hills No. 1, which follows: "(1) Months to stay as prosecuting witness, with several trials; (2) promise of immediate divorce, which will free her in a few weeks; (3) payment of some of her expenses; (4) the fact that she has severely punished me already; to carry it further might change public feeling, and be thought vindictive." This paper was put in evidence by the state, and its admission is assigned for error. The first objection to the paper in question is that it was received in evidence in violation of § 333 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that "no practising attorney, . . . minister of the gospel, or priest of parently on the assumption that the Indian custom with reference to marriages contemplated that the man might take other wives during the lifetime of the first wife.

In State v. Ta-cha-na-tah, 64 N. C. 614, it was held that the cohabitation of an Indian man and woman, as husband and wife, which, according to the ancient custom of their tribe, entitled them to recognition as man and wife, but which left them free to dissolve the connection at pleasure and marry again, was not a valid marriage in North Carolina. In this case, however, the parties were subject to the jurisdiction of North Carolina at the time of the marriage, and the validity of the marriage was tested by the law of North Carolina. The case is therefore distinguished from those in which the marriage took place within Indian territory not subject to the jurisdiction of the state.

It is apparent from the foregoing citations that the American decisions have not extended the exception with reference to polygamous marriages so as to cover the first marriage. It was even held in Kobogum v. Jackson Iron Co. 76 Mich. 498, 43 N. W. 602, that a second marriage by a person having a wife living and undivorced will be recognized, if valid by the lex loci. In that case a member of an Indian tribe, living in tribal relations, took a second wife while his first wife was living and undivorced. The validity of both marriages, and the legitimacy of children of each marriage, and their right to succeed to their father's property, were recognized. The court, in justification of its position, said that while most civilized nations have discarded polygamy, and it is not lawful anywhere among English speaking nations, yet it is a recognized and valid institution among many nations, and not universally unlawful. This decision, however, seems to be opposed to the clear weight of authority, which at the farthest recognizes only the validity of the first marriage.

In a dissenting opinion in State v. Ross, 76 N. C. 242, Reade, J., said: "I timidly, but very positively, deny what a great judge (Rufin) has said, that a Turk with his many wives, or a Mormon, can have his rights which he has in his own country recognized here, because it is revolting to our people and against their best interests."

In the following cases the validity of Indian marriages between members of an Indian tribe living as a separate community or people was recognized by state courts, notwithstanding that the Indian custom with reference to marriage contemplated the dissolution of the relation at any time at the mere will of one or both parties. Wall v. Williamson, 8 Ala. 48; Earl v. Godley, 42 Minn. 361, sub nom. Earl v. Wilson, 7 L. R. A. 125, 44 N. W. 254.

These decisions are contrary to the dictum in Hyde v. Hyde, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 131, 35 L. J. Mat. N. S. 57, 12 Jur. N. S. 414, 14 L. T. N. S. 188, 14 Week. Rep. 517, that to entitle a marriage to recognition under the principles of international law, it must be the voluntary union of a man and woman for life.

In Johnson v. Johnson, 30 Mo. 72, 77 Am. Dec. 598, involving the legitimacy of children and their right to inherit from their father, the relation existing between a white man and Indian woman who lived together in the Indian country, assuming it to be such as to constitute a marriage according to the custom of the Indians, was recognized as constituting a marriage de facto, notwithstanding that, according to such custom, the idea of permanency did not enter into the marriage relation, which was dissolvable at any time at the mere pleasure of the husband. It is to be observed in this case, however, that it was only necessary to establish a marriage de facto, and not necessarily the existence of a valid marriage, since the Missouri statute expressly provided that the issue of a marriage null in law should be legitimate.

The principles announced in the last case were approved in Boyer v. Dively, 58 Mo. 510, and La Riviere v. La Riviere, 77 Mo. 512.

In Morgan v. McGhee, 5 Humph. 13, a marriage, consummated according to usages of the Cherokee tribe of Indians, within that portion of the Cherokee country which was within the limits of Tennessee by the extension of the laws of Tennessee over it, was held valid. The character of the matrimonial agreement as to permanency, exclusiveness, etc., does not appear. It was held that all that was necessary to constitute a marriage according to such custom was a public agreement to live together as man and wife.

In Roche v. Washington, 19 Ind. 53, 81 Am. Dec. 376, the court denied the validity of a so-called marriage between members of the Miami tribe of Indians, contracted according to the custom of the tribe, while the parties were residing in Indiana. The real ground of the decision was that the marriage was contracted after all territorial jurisdiction of the tribe had ceased in the state, and after the tribe itself, with its government, had disappeared from the borders of the state. The court, however, intimated its opinion that a tribe of North American Indians did not constitute a state in the international sense, so as to come within the rule that a marriage valid according to the law any denomination, shall be allowed, in giving testimony, to disclose any confidential communication properly intrusted to him in his professional capacity, and necessary and proper to enable him to discharge the functions of his office according to the usual course of practice or discipline." To render a communication to a minister of the gospel or priest privileged, it must have been received in confidence. By this we do not mean that it must be made under the express promise of secrecy, but rather that the communication was in confidence, and with the understanding, express or implied, that it should not be revealed to anyone. The mere fact that a communication is made to a person who is a lawyer, a doctor, or a priest does not of itself make such communication privileged. To have that effect, it must have been made in confidence of the relation, and under such circumstances as to imply that it should forever remain a secret in the breast of the confidential adviser. In the case at bar there was adduced evidence tending to show that the paper was not committed to Rev. Young as a secret or in confidence. On the other hand, he was enjoined by the defendant, as is shown by the evidence, to make the contents thereof fully known to Mrs. Hills, the first wife of the defendant. Had the defendant requested Rev. Young to call a public meeting of the citizens of Blair in the interest of the former, and to address the same upon the subjects included in the paper in question handed to the godly man as the subjects of his discourse, it would hardly have been questioned by anyone that the paper would not be privileged. In principle there is no distinction between the supposed case and of the place where celebrated is valid everywhere; and the court further expressed the opinion that, even if it were to be regarded as a state in the international sense, the so-called marriage was not such a marriage as is contemplated by the rule referred to, since the real relation, which was called a marriage, was a mere state of concubinage which, according to the custom of the tribe, could be dissolved by the consent of the parties.

Although marriage, like other civil contracts, must be regulated by the lex loci contractus, it is not every marriage which may be valid by the law of the place where it was consummated, that will be recognized as legal everywhere else. Every sovereign state is the conservator of its own morals, and may nullify incestuous and polygamous contracts (obiter). Sneed v. Ewing, 5 J. J. Marsh. 460, 22 Am. Dec. 41.

A marriage between a British citizen, temporarily resident in Japan, and a Japanese woman, celebrated according to the forms required by the laws of that country, will be recognized as valid in England. Brinkley v. Atty. Gen., L. R. 15 Prob. Div. 76. There was no question as to the capacity of the parties in this case. It was pointed out that the contract of marriage, according to the Japanese law, involved the union of one man with one woman to the exclusion of all others. The court took the position that the rule that a marriage valid where contracted is valid everywhere is not confined to marriages contracted in Christian countries, but extends to marriages wherever contracted, if the contract, in its essence, conforms to the general principles prevailing throughout Christendom.

In Armitage v. Armitage, L. R. 3 Eq. 343, it was held that the testimony of a witness that he went to New Zealand before it was an English colony, and that he was there married to a native woman according to the customs and usages then in force in New Zealand, was not sufficient to establish a marriage, in the absence of evidence of what those customs or usages were.

III. Matrimonial capacity of the parties.

a. In general; lex loci or lex domicilii; public policy.

There are expressions in the opinions in some of the cases which seem to favor the doctrine that, while the lex loci governs with respect to matters affecting the manner or mode of solemnization of the marriage and the preliminaries thereof, the question of matrimonial capacity is to be determined by the lex domicilii. L. R. A.

et al.; and some of the decisions seem to be the result of the application of that doctrine. Most, but not all, of these decisions, however, are reducible to one or the other of the exceptions (which have been formulated in Brook v. Brook, 9 H. L. Cas. 193, 7 Jur. N. S. 422, 4 L. T. N. S. 93, 9 Week. Rep. 461; Jackson v. Jackson, 82 Md. 17, 34 L. R. A. 778, 83 Atl. 317; Com. v. Lane, 113 Mass. 458, 18 Am. Rep. 509; and Courtright v. Courtright, 26 Ohio L. J. 309) to the general principle that the validity of a marriage is to be determined by reference to the lex loci, namely, (1) marriages which are polygamous, or which are incestuous according to the general view of Christendom; (2) marriages which the local lawmaking power has declared shall not be allowed any validity. By the first exception the Christian standard of marriage is applied to every marriage wherever celebrated and without reference to the domicile of the parties at the time of its celebration. If the marriage falls below this standard, it will be held void, although it may be valid according to the lex loci and lex domicilii. The application of this exception to polygamous marriages has been discussed in division II., supra, and its application to incestuous marriages will be discussed in division III., b, infra.

To bring a marriage within the second exception, that very marriage must be within the legislative prohibition. A marriage will not necessarily come within that exception because it would have been within the prohibition if it had been celebrated within the state or country which enacted the same. The question whether a marriage comes within the prohibition, and therefore within the exception, is, in its last analysis, one of legislative intention. There can be no question as to the power of the legislature to prescribe what marriages shall be void in its own state, wherever celebrated, or wherever the parties may have been domiciled at the time of celebration, if they subsequently came or returned to the state (Pennegar v. State, 87 Tenn. 244, 2 L. R. A. 703, 10 S. W. 305). Therefore, the language of the statute is the first matter for consideration, and if the marriage comes within the terms of the statute, its invalidity necessarily follows without reference to the lex loci or lex domicilii. When, however, as is generally the case, the legislature merely prohibits, in general terms, marriages between persons standing in a certain relation to each other it becomes necessary to examine the nature and object of the statute in order to determine the scope of the prohibition (Brook v. Brook, 9 H. L. Cas. 193, 7 Jur. N. S. 422, 4 L. T. N. S. 93, 9 Week. Rep. 461). Examining the statute from this point of view, the one with which we have been dealing. It is plain that Rev. Young betrayed no confidence of the prisoner in revealing the contents of this paper or writing.

It is also urged that this paper was inadmissible as a confession, because it was prompted by an inducement of hope or fear. The evidence on behalf of the state discloses that it was voluntarily written and delivered by defendant to Rev. Young without any suggestion on the part of the latter that the accused would in the least be benefited thereby, or that it was given on any promise of reward or threat of punishment.

After the state had made out its case in chief, the defendant moved ore tenus to strike from the record all the evidence and certain exhibits adduced by the prosecution relating to the marriage ceremony between the accused and the first Mrs. Hills in England, in September, 1885, for the reason that the evidence on the part of the state did not prove, or tend to prove, that the marriage was valid. In passing upon the motion, the court, in the hearing and presence of the jury, stated: "There was evidence in the record tending to show cohabitation in the larger sense." Exception was taken to this remark, and its utterance is urged as a ground of reversal. It is true, as contended, that it was for the jury to determine whether the accused and Mrs. Hills No. 1 were lawfully married and cohabited as husband and wife. The remark of the court did not take this issue from the consideration of the triers of fact. The remarks of the court were elicited by the motion of the defendant, and in passing thereon the court gave its reason for denying the motion; and, as there was some evidence in the

it is apparent that the nature and object of the law may be such that its purpose is fully subverted by limiting it to marriage celebrated in the state or country where it was enacted, between persons there domiciled. Thus, in Medway v. Needham, 16 Mass. 157, 8 Am. Dec. 131, infra, III., c, the court seems to have proceeded upon the theory that the purpose of the statute was fully subverted by applying it to marriages celebrated within the commonwealth, and that it did not extend to marriages celebrated out of the commonwealth, even between persons domiciled in the commonwealth who went out of it to celebrate the marriage for the express purpose of evading the statute. In Brook v. Brook, 9 H. L. Cas. 193, 7 Jur. N. S. 422, 4 L. T. N. S. 93, 9 Week. Rep. 461, infra, III., c, on the contrary, it was held that, in view of the nature and objects of the statute there involved, it must be held to apply to marriages between domiciled citizens of England, although celebrated out of England and in a country according to the law of which the marriage would be valid. Considerable stress was laid in this case upon the fact that the act of Parliament declared the marriages of the kind contemplated by it to be contrary to the law of God. Perhaps, in the absence of such a declaration, it might have been regarded that the purpose of the act would be subverted by limiting it to marriages celebrated in England. And, on the other hand, the presence of such a declaration might have been regarded as a strong argument for extending it to marriages celebrated in another country between persons domiciled in that country if the question should arise in England. As a matter of fact, however, it was conceded in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor in this case, that if the parties had been domiciled in the country where the marriage was celebrated, it would have been held valid even in England. It will be observed that in some of the cases cited in III., c, infra, a statutory prohibition in general terms has been extended to embrace marriages celebrated out of the state between persons who, at the time, were domiciled out of the state but who subsequently came within it to reside. As suggested in the opinion in Pennegar v. State, 87 Tenn. 244, 2 L. R. A. 707, 10 S. W. 303, the courts of one state may, by reason of peculiar local conditions, regard a statute as a part of the distinctive policy of the state, and therefore as applicable to marriages occurring outside of the state, whereas the courts of another state, by reason of different local conditions, may take the view that a similar statute is not a part of the distinctive policy of the state, and therefore applies only to marriages celebrated within the state. This point was illustrated in the last case by contrasting the decision in Medway v. Needham, 16 Mass. 157, 8 Am. Dec. 131, where it was held that a statute prohibiting the intermarriage of white and colored persons did not apply to marriages celebrated out of the commonwealth, though the parties were domiciled therein, with the decisions in the southern states, holding a similar statute applicable to marriages celebrated without as well as to those celebrated within the state. It must be admitted that this theory, according to which every marriage must, in order to be upheld, pass, not only the test furnished by the generally accepted principles of Christendom, but likewise the test furnished by the distinctive policy of the state or country where the court is sitting, determined in the manner above explained, has the disadvantage that under it the parties to the marriage may be husband and wife in one state or country, and not in another. Upon the other hand, the acceptance of the doctrine of lex loci without exception other than that with reference to marriages contrary to the general principles of Christendom, would put the courts in the position of recognizing the validity of marriages which are opposed to the distinctive state policy, notwithstanding that the parties to the marriage were, at the time of its celebration, domiciled within the state. In any case, whether the doctrine of lex loci or lex domicilii is adopted, it is subject to alteration by the legislature of a state if that body sees fit to condemn, in express terms, a marriage celebrated out of the state between persons domiciled in the state, and in such a case it would necessarily follow that a marriage might be valid in one state, and not in another.

It is to be observed that this theory, by which a marriage, wherever celebrated or wherever the parties to it are domiciled, is subjected to the test of the distinctive policy of the state or country where the court is sitting, does not constitute an independent doctrine like the doctrine that the lex domicilii governs, or the doctrine that the lex loci governs, but operates by way of exception to the doctrine of lex loci, which seems to be favored by the weight of authority over the doctrine of lex domicilii as a general principle of international law. This exception might, with equal propriety, be attached to the doctrine of lex domicilii, if that should be adopted as the general principle. The exception leaves free scope for the doctrine of lex loci, or, if it is preferred, the doctrine of lex domicilii, when a marriage, celebrated out of the state between persons not domiciled in the state, is contrary neither to record upon which the remark could properly be predicated, the criticism upon this particular action of the trial court is overruled. The mere overruling of the motion by the court without giving any reasons therefor would be an expression of the opinion that there was sufficient evidence to establish the marriage of Hills in England. The language of the court was not prejudicially erroneous.

The court, at the request of the state, gave this instruction: "(4) You are instructed that in this case, so far as the validity or invalidity of the alleged first marriage is concerned, it makes no difference whether or not the defendant, Hills, or the witness Eliza Cook Hills, or either of them, resided or had their usual place of abode or residence in the parish of Sheffield, England, before obtaining the license, or before the marriage ceremony; and you will therefore disregard all evidence received upon the trial of this case on the subject of said residence and places of abode prior to the marriage ceremony on September 11, 1885, in so far as the question of the validity or invalidity of the license and marriage ceremony are concerned.

It is in evidence that the license under which the defendant was married to his first wife was obtained by her in the parish of Sheffield, England, and in which parish the marriage ceremony was pronounced. In the affidavit upon which the license was issued the contracting lady stated that she had been a resident in the parish of Sheffield, England, for the fifteen days immediately prior thereto, and there was introduced evidence conducing to show that neither Mr. Hills nor his intended wife had ever been a resident in the parish of Sheffield, England, prior to the marriage ceremony. The principles of Christendom nor the distinctive policy of the state. Thus, in Dannell v. Dannell, 4 Bush, 51, a court of Kentucky expressly applied the doctrine of lex loci and upheld a marriage celebrated in Switzerland, according to the law of which it was valid, between a man and the widow of his deceased brother, who were domiciled at the time in Lombardy, then a province of Austria, by the law of which such marriages were forbidden, notwithstanding that the marriage was celebrated in Switzerland for the purpose of evading the law of Lombardy, and the parties immediately returned to the latter country and resided there. It is to be observed that in this case the marriage was neither contrary to the principles of Christendom, nor to the distinctive policy of Kentucky so that the general principle of international law had free scope. On the contrary, in the case of Sottomayer v. De Barros, L. R. 3 Prob. Div. 1, 47 L. J. Prob. N. S. 23, 26 Week. Rep. 455, the court of appeal, upon the assumption that both parties to the marriage were domiciled in Portugal, held that a marriage in England between first cousins, being forbidden by the law of Portugal, though valid according to the law of England, must be regarded as invalid even in England. In this case, also, it is apparent that the court was free to adopt a general principle of international law, and was not embarrassed by any consideration arising from the principles of Christendom, or the distinctive policy of England. But in this case the court, unlike the Kentucky court, preferred the doctrine of lex domicilii to the doctrine of lex loci. The decision in this case was strictly limited to the assumption that both parties were domiciled in Portugal at the time of the marriage, and the court of appeal expressly refrained from passing upon the validity of the marriage on the assumption that one of the parties was domiciled in England. The case subsequently came before the probate division (L. R. 5 Prob. Div. 24, 49 L. J. Prob. N. S. 1, 41 L. T. N. S. 281, 27 Week. Rep. 917) upon a changed state of facts,—it then being found that the husband was domiciled in England at the time of the marriage and the wife in Portugal,—and it was then held by the probate division that the marriage, being valid according to the law of England (lex loci), would be upheld in England notwithstanding that it would be invalid according to the law of Portugal, the domicile of the wife at the time of the marriage. The probate division took advantage of the fact that the court of appeal expressly left open the question of the validity of the marriage on such an assumption of facts, but the reasoning in the opinion of the president of the probate division weakens somewhat the force of the decision of the court of appeal as a precedent for courts not actually bound by it. Cotton, L. J., who delivered the judgment of the court of appeal, said: "But it is a well-recognized principle of law that the question of personal capacity to enter into any contract is to be decided by the law of domicile. It is, however, urged that this does not apply to the contract of marriage, and that a marriage valid according to the law of the country where it is solemnized is valid everywhere. This, in our opinion, is not a correct statement of the law. The law of a country where a marriage is solemnized must alone decide all questions relating to the validity of the ceremony by which the marriage is alleged to have been constituted; but as in other contracts, so in that of marriage, personal capacity must depend on the law of domicile; and if the laws of any country prohibit its subjects, within certain degrees of consanguinity, from contracting marriage, and stamp a marriage between persons within the prohibited degrees as incestuous, this, in our opinion, imposes on the subjects of that country a personal incapacity which continues to affect them so long as they are domiciled in the country where this law prevails, and renders invalid a marriage between persons both at the time of their marriage subjects of and domiciled in the country which imposes this restriction wherever such marriage may have been solemnized." The president of the probate division, referring to the language just quoted, said that the proposition that the capacity of the parties was to be determined by the law of the domicile was a novel one for which, up to that time, there was no English authority, but that, on the other hand, the authority was the other way, and to the effect that the capacity was to be determined by the lex loci.

Milliken v. Pratt, 125 Mass. 374, 28 Am. Rep. 241, merely involved the question whether the capacity of a married woman to contract is governed by the lex domicilii, or the lex loci contractus. The court, however, stated that the decision in Sottomayer v. De Barros, L. R. 3 Prob. Div. 1, 47 L. J. Prob. N. S. 23, 26 Week. Rep. 455, to the effect that matrimonial capacity is to be determined by the lex domicilii, was utterly opposed to "our law."

In the four cases next cited it will be observed that the lex loci was applied:

1. Re Allison, 31 L. T. N. S. 638, 23 Week. Rep. 226, it was held to be absolutely necessary that both parties to the marriage shall be capable in the country where the marriage takes resident of said parish. Chapter 76, Stat. 4 Geo. IV., relating to the solemnization of marriages in England, was introduced on the trial in evidence. Section 10 of said chapter provides that no license shall be issued to solemnize any marriage in any other church or chapel than in the parish church, or in some public chapel of the parish or chapelry within which the usual place of abode of one of the parties to be married shall have been for the space of fifteen days immediately before the granting of such license. Section 14 of the same statute provides, inter alia, in substance that the applicant for license shall make affidavit that one of the contracting parties has had a usual place of abode in such parish or chapelry within which the marriage is to be solemnized for fifteen days prior to the date of the license. Section 22 declares that, if any person "shall knowingly and wilfully intermarry . . . without due publication of banns, or license from a person having authority to grant the same first had and obtained, . . . the marriages of such persons shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever." Section 28 provides "that after the solemnization of any marriage . . . where the marriage is by license, it shall not be necessary to give any proof that the usual place of abode of one of the parties, for the space of fifteen days as aforesaid, was in the parish or chapelry where the marriage was solemnized; nor shall any evidence in either of the said cases be received to prove the contrary in any suit touching the validity of such marriage." The English decisions rendered under the foregoing provisions, some of which were introduced on the trial and incorporated in place. The marriage in this case was held invalid because by the law of Persia, where it took place, the woman was incapable of marriage because she was pregnant. The woman was an Armenian and living under the protection of the British minister to Persia, and the man was a British vice-consul.

In Campbell v. Crampton, 18 Blatchf. 150, 2 Fed. 417, the court, while holding that the capacity of the parties to enter into a contract for a future marriage must be determined by the law of Alabama, the place where the contract was made, and not by the law of New York, where it was contemplated that the marriage should take place, conceded that the general rule was that a marriage good at the place of solemnization is good everywhere. This concession goes to the validity of the marriage as affected by the capacity of the parties, and it is made without reference to the domicile of the parties.

The act of Congress of 1882 with reference to pensions provides that in determining the fact of marriage, the law of the place controls. United States v. Hays, 20 Fed. 710. The validity of the marriage in this case was attacked for incapacity of one of the parties.

In Kynnauld v. Leslie, L. R. 1 C. P. 389, 35 L. J. C. P. N. S. 226, 12 Jur. N. S. 468, 14 L. T. N. S. 756, 14 Week. Rep. 761, where the validity of a foreign marriage by a citizen of England previously attainted of treason was involved, Willes, J., said that whatever might have been the case if the marriage had been contracted in England, the marriage having been contracted abroad with an innocent woman, who may not even have known of the attainder, the rule, according to which the lex loci, with some exceptions founded on public policy, governs contracts, must prevail. It was held in this case, however, that the marriage would have been valid even if contracted in England.

In Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Clark & F. 152, the House of Lords held that the English statute providing that no descendant of King George II. shall be capable of contracting marriage without the previous consent of the reigning sovereign, rendered the marriage of such a descendant without such consent invalid, although it occurred in Rome; but this decision is clearly upon the ground that the purpose and object of the statute required its extension to a marriage celebrated out of England. In other words, the statute in this case was a part of the distinctive policy of England, and the case, therefore came within the second exception stated above.

Va. 636, 56 Am. Rep. 603, infra, III., c. seems to adopt the lex domicilii as the test of matrimonial capacity. It is to be observed, however, that in these cases the domicile and the forum were the same, so that the same result was reached by applying the doctrine of lex domicilii as would have been reached by applying the distinctive national policy theory by way of exception to the doctrine of lex loci. It is at least doubtful whether the court would have been willing to abide by the lex domicilii if the parties had been domiciled at the place where the marriage was celebrated at the time of its celebration, but had subsequently removed to Virginia. Adherence to the doctrine of lex domicilii in such a case would compel the recognition of the marriage. Such seems to have been the state of facts in State v. Bell, 7 Baxt. 9, 32 Am. Rep. 549, infra, III. c (one of the cases relied on by Greenhow v. James), in which case, however, the marriage was held invalid.

In State v. Kennedy, 78 N. C. 251, infra, III., c, the court, after referring to some of the cases and text books which advocate the doctrine that the matrimonial capacity of parties is to be determined by the lex loci rather than the lex domicilii, said: "It seems to us, however, that when it is conceded, as it is, that a state may by legislation extend her law prescribing incapacities for contracting marriage over her own citizens who contract marriage in other countries, by whose law no such incapacities exist, as Massachusetts did after the decision in Medway v. Needham, the main question is conceded, and what remains is of little importance. Nothing remains but the question of legislative intent to be collected from the statute. About the intent in this case we have no doubt."

In Pennegar v. State, 87 Tenn. 244, 2 L. R. A. 703, 10 S. W. 305, infra, III., d, where a marriage between persons domiciled in Tennessee, who went out of the state to evade its statute which forbade their marriage, was held invalid though valid according to the law of the place where it was celebrated, the decision is expressly put upon the ground that it was a part of the distinctive policy of the state, as evidenced by the statute, to forbid marriages contemplated by the statute between persons domiciled within the state, although the marriage was celebrated out of the state. If the facts in this case had required it, the court might have gone to the extent of holding that it was a distinctive part of the policy of the state to refuse recognition of marriages of the kind contemplated by the statute, even if celebrated out of the state, between persons at the

the bill of exceptions, affirmed the doctrine that a marriage is not void merely because neither of the contracting parties was at the time a resident of the parish wherein the marriage ceremony occurred, and that the residence or place of abode of the parties does not affect the validity of the marriage. Manifestly, these adjudications are sound. No other interpretations can properly be placed on § 26, already quoted. But it is urged that said section is not applicable here, for the reason that it declares a rule of evidence relating to the remedy only, and that it can be given no extraterritorial effect. A ready answer to this is that a marriage legal where solemnized is valid everywhere. 1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. 6th ed. §§ 371-389. Therefore § 26 can be considered for the purpose of ascertaining whether the first marriage of the defendant was valid in England. The validity of a marriage is to be determined by the law of the place where the same was solemnized, and § 26 was a part of the law of England when the first marriage took place. Under the authorities we have no doubt of its validity, and, being binding upon the parties there, its validity cannot be successfully assailed here. The instruction was therefore not inappropriate or erroneous.

The final contention of counsel for accused is that the court below erred in instructing the jury to the effect that the validity of the alleged first marriage of Hills was not affected by any agreement or understanding of the parties entered into before such alleged marriage that the same should not be considered as a valid or binding marriage. We quite agree with the learned counsel for the prisoner that there can be no valid marriage domiciled out of the state but who afterward came to reside within the state. Such conclusion, however, does not necessarily follow from the decision, as it is conceivable, at least, that the court might regard the purpose of the statute as fully subserved by applying it to marriages of persons domiciled within the state wherever celebrated, without applying it to marriages of persons not at the time domiciled within the state.

In Conway v. Beazley, 3 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 636, the court said that the lex loci will not prevail when either of the contracting parties is under a legal incapacity by the law of the domicile, but this language is broader than the exigencies of the case required. It was held in that case that a remarriage in Scotland between parties domiciled in England, after a Scotch divorce, which was valid in Scotland but invalid in England because the parties to the divorce were domiciled in the latter state at the time it was rendered, would not be recognized in England although valid in Scotland. It is apparent that the adoption of the view that it was opposed to the public policy of England to recognize the validity of such a marriage would have sufficed for the purposes of the case without going to the extent of adopting the lex domicilii as a general principle of international law. And it will be observed that the House of Lords in Shaw v. Gould, L. R. 3 H. L. 55, 37 L. J. Ch. N. S. 433, 18 L. T. N. S. 833, held such a marriage invalid in England, notwithstanding that after the Scotch divorce the party who obtained it became domiciled in Scotland, and that both parties to the second marriage were, at the time of its celebration, domiciled in Scotland. It was immaterial, for the purposes of the last case, whether the lex loci or lex domicilii should be regarded as the general principle of international law. The application of either doctrine to the case in hand would have upheld the marriage, and it is therefore apparent that the marriage must have been regarded as coming within some exception to the general principles of international law. The case of McGown v. McGown, 18 Misc. 708, 43 N. Y. Supp. 745, affirmed in 19 App. Div. 368, 46 N. Y. Supp. 285, was substantially like the last case. In this case the New York court refused to recognize as valid a second marriage contracted by a woman in North Dakota, after obtaining a divorce in that state based on service by publication, even on the assumption that the parties to the second marriage were to be regarded as domiciled in North Dakota at the time the marriage took place, and that the marriage was valid in that state. It would seem that the last three cases might be referred to the exception with reference to polygamous marriages, since the hypothesis on which they are decided is that the first marriage was not dissolved. It is obvious, at least, that the last two must be referred to some exception to the general principle of international law, whether that principle be deemed the lex loci or lex domicilii, for the application of either would have upheld the marriage.

In Davis v. Davis, 1 Abb. N. C. 140, the validity of a marriage per verba de presenti was tested by the lex domicilii, but this was because the place at which the acts relied upon as constituting the marriage occurred was not subject to any local law, so far as parties to the marriage were concerned. The alleged marriage occurred within the limits of the Chickasaw nation in the Indian territory, and the parties, who were not members of the tribe, were expressly excluded from the jurisdiction of the nation. In this case, therefore, there was no lex loci which could be applied, and it was for that reason that the lex domicilii was applied.

It must be admitted that it is not easy in all cases to determine whether or not a statute is a part of the distinctive policy of the state, and, if so, whether the distinctive policy evinced thereby requires the condemnation of marriages celebrated out of the state between persons domiciled out of the state, or is satisfied with the condemnation of marriages celebrated out of the state between persons domiciled in the state. The latter object could be accomplished by the adoption of the lex domicilii as the test of matrimonial capacity without reference to the distinctive policy of the forum. But the adoption of that doctrine for the purpose is objectionable, not only because it is contrary to the weight of authority which favors the lex loci as the general test, but also because adherence to it would require the court to recognize the validity of a marriage, valid according to the lex domicilii, celebrated in another state between persons who were domiciled in such state at the time of the marriage, although they subsequently came to reside at the forum. The adoption of the distinctive national policy theory, on the other hand, admits of the condemnation of marriages celebrated between persons domiciled at the forum, and, if the conditions require it, the condemnation of marriages between persons not at the time domiciled at the forum.

It is to be observed that the exceptions thus far discussed operate, if at all, to invalidate a marriage valid according to the lex loci or lex domicilii, and never to validate a marriage invalid according to the lex loci or lex domicilii.

riage without an agreement and consent of the parties to become husband and wife. The instruction criticised is not in conflict with the principle just stated. The instruction did not tell the jury that if, at the time of the alleged first marriage of defendant, there was an agreement that the marriage ceremony was to be regarded as a sham, and to be of no binding force, and in pursuance of such understanding of the parties the marriage ceremony was pronounced, the marriage was not to be affected thereby. The purport of the charge was that any understanding or agreement between the contracting parties before marriage would not invalidate the marriage subsequently solemnized. This was undoubtedly sound, especially when the marriage was not solemnized in conformity with such prior agreement. The criticism of defendant's counsel upon this instruction is ably met by the brief of the attorney general, wherein it is stated: "An agreement to be married, and an agreement that the marriage contract shall not be binding on either party, are inconsistent and contradictory. If the nullifying agreement is to receive the sanction of courts, then the marriage contract can be dissolved by the parties themselves. All that would be necessary to dissolve or annul the marriage would be, not a decree of court, but a simple agreement prior to the ceremony that the marriage would not be binding on either party. Neither public policy nor public conscience would suffer such a doctrine to live. We confess our inability to find where any court has ever before been asked to sustain this new and novel doctrine. In this case a valid first marriage was sought to be proved.

It was, indeed, suggested in the opinion in Minor v. Jones, 2 Redf. 289 (a surrogate's decision), as a ground for upholding a slave marriage invalid according to the law of Virginia (lex loci and lex domicilii), that, as the parties did all they could to make the marriage valid, the court might, in analogy to the exception by which marriages contrary to the general principles of Christendom are excluded from the rule that a marriage valid where celebrated is valid everywhere, except from the rule that a marriage invalid where celebrated is invalid everywhere, marriages which, though invalid according to the lex loci, conform to the moral code and to the public sentiment of the state where the court is sitting. But a similar marriage was held in Harris v. Cooper, 31 U. C. Q. R. 182, to be invalid in Canada because invalid where celebrated, though it would have been valid if celebrated in Canada.

A third exception, however, has been suggested which would operate in certain cases to uphold a marriage between parties domiciled in the state where the court is sitting, though invalid in a foreign country where it was celebrated. This exception has been defined as including marriages celebrated in foreign countries by subjects entitling themselves, under special circumstances, to the benefit of the laws of their own country. The extent to which this exception has been applied with reference to matters affecting the form of ceremony or the preliminaries has been shown in subdivision I., and is further illustrated by some of the cases cited in subdivision III., 2, infra. Although there seem to be no cases applying this exception to matrimonial capacity, it has been suggested by Mr. Wharton, in his work on Conflict of Laws, § 165 (3) note, that the restrictive legislation of foreign states should not invalidate marriages of our domiciled citizens solemnized in such states, or marriages of their domiciled citizens solemnized in one of our states. It may be remarked that if the doctrine of lex loci is adopted as a general principle of international law in determining the matrimonial capacity of parties it is only necessary to invoke the exception referred to for the purpose of upholding a marriage between "our" citizens in a foreign country; and the other class of marriages, i. e., marriages celebrated in our country between domiciled citizens of a foreign country, would be upheld upon the general principle. On the other hand, if the lex domicilii were adopted as a general principle, it would only be necessary to invoke the exception for the purpose of sustaining marriages of the latter class, and marriages of the former class, i. e. marriages between our 57 L. R. A.

domiciled citizens in foreign countries, would fall within the general principle.

* b. Incestuous marriages.

See also supra, III. a.

Whether the general principle of international law be that the lex loci or lex domicilii governs with respect to matrimonial capacity, in either case it is subject to the first exception referred to in III. a, supra, viz., that marriages will not be recognized if incestuous according to the general consent of Christendom as being contrary to natural law. Lord Wensleydale, in his opinion in Brook v. Brook, 9 H. L. Cas. 193, took the position that a marriage between a man and his deceased wife's sister would fall within such exception. The real ground, however, upon which the law lords agreed in this case was that the case came within the second of the exceptions referred to in subdivision III., a, supra, i. e., marriage contrary to the distinctive policy of England.

In Sutton v. Warren, 10 Met. 451; Com. v. Lane, 113 Mass. 458, 18 Am. Rep. 509 (obiter); Stevenson v. Gray, 17 B. Mon. 193; Courtright v. Courtright, 26 Ohio L. J. 309; and Pennegar v. State, 87 Tenn. 244, 2 L. R. A. 703, 10 S. W. 305 (obiter),—the first exception was expressly limited to marriages regarded as incestuous by the common consent of Christendom as contrary to natural law, and, more specifically, to marriages in the direct lineal line of consanguinity, and, in the collateral line, between brothers and sisters.

In Sutton v. Warren, 10 Met. 451, it was assumed, presumably in view of the evidence in the case as to the law of England on the subject, that a marriage celebrated in England between a man and his mother's sister domiciled in that country was valid according to the law of England; and, upon that assumption, it was held that it must be regarded as valid in Massachusetts, notwithstanding that if celebrated in that state it would have been invalid. This decision was severely criticised by the Lord Chancellor in Brook v. Brook, but the justice of the criticism is not apparent, since, upon the assumption of fact in the case that the marriage was valid according to the law of England, the case was in principle exactly the same as the supposed case of a marriage between a man and his deceased wife's sister domiciled in Denmark, which, it was conceded by the Lord Chancellor, would have been held valid even in England. In Stevenson v. Gray, 17 B. Mon. 193, a marriage celebrated in Tennessee, valid by the law of that state, between a man and

There was record evidence of the ceremony. The wife testified to it. The defendant on the witness stand admitted the ceremony, and his participation therein; admitted the authority of the Reverend Blakeney, vicar of the parish church, to issue license; admitted the authority of the Reverend Charles Knight to solemnize the marriage; did not deny the paternity of the child born eighteen months after marriage; introduced the woman as his wife to relatives and others; admits he signed the marriage register kept in the church where the ceremony was performed. Is he to be permitted now to claim this marriage was void because of an antenuptial agreement that it should not be binding? Where there is a pretense of marriage for some other and ulterior purposes, mutually and jointly beneficial and agreeable to both parties, then there is no marriage. It is a pretense, and in law ends there. This is the rule so elaborately sustained by counsel's citations. In the case at bar there was no pretense. There was a marriage contract and a marriage ceremony. The agreement to keep it secret was not a pretense and could not avoid or invalidate it. Any agreement that it should not be binding and valid, before it was made, could not affect its validity after the ceremony was performed."

The defendant is a clergyman, "a teacher of high and noble precepts," and yet the record before us discloses that he has violated one of the Ten Commandments and the teachings of Holy Writ. The jury have found him guilty, and the verdict is manifestly right.

The judgment is accordingly affirmed.

the widow of his deceased uncle, was recognized as valid in Kentucky, although at the time of its celebration the Kentucky statute forbade the marriage of persons standing in such relation, and notwithstanding that both parties were domiciled in Kentucky at the time of the marriage and continued to be domiciled there after the marriage, merely going to Tennessee transiently and for the very purpose of evading the Kentucky statute.

In Dannell v. Dannell, 4 Bush, 51, supra, III., a. it will be observed that the lex loci was applied to a marriage between a man and the widow of his deceased brother, and the marriage was upheld, although forbidden by the lex domicilii, while in Sottomayor v. DeBarros, L. R. 3 Prob. Div. 1, 47 L. J. Prob. N. S. 23, 26 Week. Rep. 455, supra, III., a. on the contrary, the lex domicilii was applied and the marriage held invalid because incestuous by the lex domicilii, though not within the specific exception already mentioned as to marriages incestuous by the general consent of Christendom.

In Blaisdell v. Bliskum, 139 Mass. 250, 1 N. E. 281, it was assumed without discussion that a marriage in New Hampshire between a man and the daughter of his mother's sister, being null and void under the New Hampshire statute, was null and void in Massachusetts. In this case, however, it will be observed that the marriage was invalid where celebrated, and so the decision is merely the result of the application of the lex loci, it being remembered that the exception with reference to incestuous marriages never operates to validate a marriage invalid where celebrated, but only in certain cases to invalidate a marriage valid where celebrated.

In Mette v. Mette, 1 Swabey & T. 416, 28 L. J. Prob. N. S. 117, it was held, upon the authority of Brook v. Brook, that a marriage of a naturalized citizen of Great Britain domiciled in England, with his deceased wife's sister, was invalid in England, although it took place in a foreign country where such sister was domiciled.

And in Chapman v. Bradley, 4 DeG. J. & S. 71, 12 Week. Rep. 140, 9 L. T. N. S. 495, 10 Jur. N. S. 5, 33 L. J. Ch. N. S. 139, 3 New. Rep. 1, it was held that a marriage in Switzerland between an uncle and a niece of his deceased wife, domiciled in England, though valid where celebrated, was invalid in England.

So, in United States ex rel. Devine v. Rodgers, 109 Fed. 886, it was held that a marriage in Russia between Russian Jews who were uncle and niece, though lawful where celebrated, would not be recognized as valid in Pennsylvania. The court conceded the general rule 57 L. R. A.

that a marriage valid where celebrated is valid everywhere, but said that the rule was subject to at least the following exception: "If the relation, . . . although lawful in the foreign country [where it was entered into], is stigmatized as incestuous by the law of Pennsylvania, no rule of comity requires a court sitting in this state to recognize the foreign marriage as valid."

The decisions in the last three cases, like that in Brook v. Brook, must be referred to the second exception mentioned in subdivision III., a, supra, with reference to marriages contrary to the distinctive policy of the state or country where the court is sitting, rather than to the first exception, which relates specifically to marriages incestuous according to the principles of Christendom. It is thus apparent that there is a conflict of authority upon the question whether a statute which extends the prohibition of marriages between relatives beyond the limit referred to in the first exception is to be regarded as a part of the distinctive policy of the state or country which enacts it.

The conclusion with reference to incestuous marriages seems to be that the marriage is, in the first instance, to be tested by the lex loci; if it meets that test, it may still be held invalid because incestuous by the common consent of Christendom, as previously explained; and if valid by the lex loci, and not incestuous according to the general consent of Christendom, it may still be held invalid because contrary to the distinctive national policy of the forum as evidenced by a municipal law declaring such marriages incestuous. The condemnation of such a marriage, as contrary to the distinctive national policy of the forum, is more probable if the parties were, at the time, domiciled at the forum, but it is not apparent why the court might not take the view that such policy required the condemnation of marriages between persons not domiciled at the forum at the time of its celebration, but who subsequently became domiciled therein.

c. Marriages between members of different races.

See also supra, III. a.

In Medway v. Needham, 16 Mass. 157, 8 Am. Dec. 131, supra, III., a. it was held that a marriage between a mulatto and a white woman, domiciled in Massachusetts, which was celebrated in Rhode Island, must be recognized as valid in Massachusetts, it not being prohibited by the law of Rhode Island (lex loci), notwithstanding that it would have been invalid if celebrated in Massachusetts (lex domicilii). In this case the parties returned to Massachusetts and made their matrimonial domicile there and apparently went into Rhode Island to celebrate the marriage for the express purpose of evading the law of Massachusetts. The decision was put upon the ground that a marriage valid where celebrated is valid everywhere, and while the court conceded that there are exceptions to this rule as in case of incestuous marriages contrary to the religion and laws of a country, yet the exception could not be extended to cover a case where, as in the case at bar, the marriage was prohibited merely from motives of political expediency. At the time of the decision in this case, the statute had been repealed, and it may be remarked that there was no such social or political expediency requiring the condemnation of such marriages as is the case in the southern states. None of the other cases have gone so far as Medway v. Needham in upholding marriages between negroes and white persons when opposed to the law of the state where the court was sitting. In State v. Ross, 76 N. C. 242, it was held that a marriage between a negro man and a white woman, in a state where they were bona fide domiciled and according to the law of which a marriage was valid, would be recognized as valid in North Carolina, notwithstanding that it would have been invalid if it had been solemnized in the latter state. It was urged in this case that such a marriage should be excepted from the general rule that the validity of a marriage is to be tested by the law of the place where it is solemnized, upon the same ground that incestuous and polygamous marriages are excepted from the rule; but the court said that, however revolting such marriages were to persons who, by reason of living in states where the races are nearly equal in number, have an experience of matrimonial connection between them, it cannot be said that the common sentiment of the civilized and Christian world condemns them.

So, where one owning a slave in Missouri removed with her to the territory of Utah, and, after becoming domiciled there, married her, such marriage, being valid where contracted, is valid in California, although it would have been invalid if contracted in the latter state. Pearson v. Pearson, 51 Cal. 120. In this case there was a statute which expressly provided that all marriages contracted without the state, which would be valid by the laws of the country in which the same were contracted, should be valid in all courts and places within California. The court, however, said that the statute accorded with the general principle of law previously prevailing, to the effect that the validity of a marriage, except it be polygamous or incestuous, is to be tested by the law of the place where it is celebrated, and if valid there is valid everywhere, and if invalid there is equally invalid everywhere.

It will be observed that the last two cases differed from Medway v. Needham in the essential point that in these cases the parties at the time of the marriage were not domiciled in the state which enacted the statute, while in the Medway case they were.

It was implied in State v. Ross, 76 N. C. 242, and expressly held in State v. Kennedy, 76 N. C. 251, decided at the same term of court, that a marriage between such persons, domiciled in North Carolina, though celebrated in another state where they went for the express purpose of evading the law of North Carolina immediately returning to the latter state, was invalid, notwithstanding that it was valid according to the law of the place where it was celebrated. The court in the latter case said: "As to the formalities of the marriage, the lex loci will govern. But when the law of North Carolina declares that all marriages between negroes and white persons shall be void, this is a personal incapacity which follows the parties wherever they go so long as they remain domiciled in North Carolina. And we conceive that it is immaterial whether they left the state with the intent to evade its law or not, if they had not bona fide acquired a domicile elsewhere at the time of the marriage."

Kinney v. Com. 30 Gratt. 858, 32 Am. Rep. 690, and Greenhow v. James, 80 Va. 636, 56 Am. Rep. 603, supra, III., a, are to the same effect as the last case, both holding that a marriage between a white person and a negro, both domiciled in Virginia, who went out of the state to celebrate the marriage for the purpose of evading the law of Virginia, was void notwithstanding that it was valid by the law of the place where it was celebrated. In both these cases the court formally takes the position that the lex domicilii determines the matrimonial capacity.

So a marriage between a white man domiciled in Washington, and an Indian woman, will not be recognized in Washington, although it took place beyond the jurisdiction of Washington, where the parties went to the place in question to contract the marriage for the purpose of evading the Washington statute prohibiting the marriage of a white man and Indian woman. Re Wilbur, 8 Wash. 35, 35 Pac. 407. The court said that the general rule that the lex loci contractus is controlling as to the validity of marriages is subject to an exception in case the marriage is prohibited either by the statute or those laws of morality and decency which make it against the natural law of civilized nations for two persons to marry, and that in such a case it is vain for them to go beyond their domicile to engage in a contract of marriage for the purpose of avoiding the prohibition.

In Re Walker (Ariz.) 46 Pac. 67, also, it was held that a statute of Arizona which forbids the intermarriage of white persons and Indians would invalidate a marriage between a white man and an Indian woman, celebrated on an Indian reservation according to the custom of the tribe; but the decision in this case is evidently on the ground that the place where the marriage was celebrated was within the jurisdiction of the territorial government.

In State v. Tutty, 7 L. R. A. 50, 41 Fed. 753, the United States circuit court, sitting in Georgia, held that a marriage celebrated in the District of Columbia, between a white man and colored woman, would be held invalid in Georgia, notwithstanding that it was valid according to the law of the District of Columbia where it was celebrated. It appeared in this case that the Georgia statute expressly provided that marriages solemnized in another state by parties intending at the time to reside in Georgia should have the same legal consequences and effect as if solemnized in Georgia, and that parties residing in that state could not evade any of the provisions of its laws as to marriage by going into another state for the solemnization of the marriage ceremony. The court, however, takes the broad ground that the rule that a statute with reference to marriage cannot operate extra-territorially is subject to certain exceptions, among which are marriages involving polygamy and incest, and those positively prohibited by the law of a country upon motives of policy. The court says in one part of its opinion: "By statute and by unbroken authority then except by the case of Medway v. Needham, 16 Mass. 157, 8 Am. Dec. 131, such marriages, between parties domiciled at the time in the state, as are declared void by the laws of the state, will be held invalid no matter where they were contracted."

Even when the parties were domiciled, at the time of the marriage, out of the state which enacted the statute, there is some authority for holding the marriage invalid though valid according to the lex loci and lex domicilii.

A marriage valid where celebrated, but denounced by the positive state policy of the state where the question of its validity arises as affecting the morals or good order of society, will not be treated as valid. Jackson v. Jackson, 82 Md. 17, 34 L. R. A. 773, 83 Atl. 317. The court, by way of illustration, said that a marriage between a white person and a negro, though valid where celebrated, would be invalid in Maryland because against the policy of that state as declared by statute. This statement was not expressly confined to the hypothesis that the parties were domiciled in Maryland, and is apparently broad enough to cover such a marriage between persons not domiciled in Maryland at the time of its celebration.

And in State v. Bell, 7 Bart. 9, 82 Am. Rep. 549, it was expressly held that a marriage of a white man and negro woman in Mississippi, according to the law of which it was valid, would not be recognized as valid in Tennessee so as to protect the parties from prosecution under the act of the general assembly for living together in that state. So far as appears, the parties to this marriage were domiciled in Mississippi when it took place. At least, the ground upon which the decision is based seems to be broad enough to cover such a case. The court says that the rule that a marriage valid where celebrated is valid everywhere applies only to the manner and form of the marriage, and not to the capacity of the parties to contract the marriage. That the doctrine of this case was not intended to be limited to persons domiciled in Tennessee at the time of the marriage is shown by the illustrations used by the court. For instance, it says that if the rule referred to were extended to cover matrimonial capacity, it might happen that a father and daughter, or a brother and sister, could live in Tennessee in lawful wedlock because they had formed such relations in a state or country where they were not prohibited, and that a Turk or Mohammedan, with his numerous wives, might establish his harem within the state.

A marriage contracted in France between a white person and a person of color was held, in Dupre v. Bouliard, 10 La. Ann. 411, to be invalid in Louisiana. It does not expressly appear in this case that the parties in question were domiciled in Louisiana, but apparently they were, since the court said that it could not give effect to the marriage without sanctioning an evasion of the laws and setting at naught the deliberate policy of the state.

The conclusion with respect to intermarriages between members of different races seems to be that the validity of the marriage is, in the first instance, to be tested by the lex loci, but that, even if valid according to the lex loci, it may be held invalid because contrary to the distinctive policy of the forum on the subject as evidenced by its statutes. It is not apparent why this distinctive policy may not be held to condemn marriages celebrated without the state between persons at the time domiciled elsewhere but who subsequently become domiciled therein, as well as marriages between persons who, at the time of their celebration, were domiciled within the state. This is a question as to the public policy of the forum which must be answered in the light of local conditions.

d. Remarriage of divorced person.

See also supra, III. a.

See also, on this subject, note to Hernandez's Succession (La.) 24 L. R. A. 831.

There is a decided conflict of authority upon the question whether the courts of a state which has enacted a statute prohibiting and rendering void the remarriage, during the lifetime of the former spouse, or a shorter period, of a person for whose misconduct a divorce has been granted, will recognize as valid the remarriage of such a person occurring out of the state while he was still domiciled within the state. The weight of authority, however, seems to hold that if the marriage is valid according to the lex loci, it will be upheld by the courts of the state which enacted the statute, and in which the parties to the remarriage are domiciled, notwithstanding that the parties went out of the state to solemnize the second marriage, for the express purpose of evading the law of the domicile and of the forum. Re Webb, Tucker, 372; State v. Weatherby, 43 Me. 258, 69 Am. Dec. 59; Com. v. Hunt, 4 Cush. 49; Putnam v. Putnam, 8 Pick. 433; VanVoorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N. Y. 18, 40 Am. Rep. 505; Thorp v. Thorp, 90 N. Y. 602, 43 Am. Rep. 189; Moore v. Hageman, 92 N. Y. 521, 44 Am. Rep. 408, Affirming 27 Hun, 68; Peugnet v. Phelps, 48 Barb. 566; People v. Chase, 28 Hun, 310; Kerrison v. Kerrison, 8 Abb. N. C. 449; State v. Shattuck, 69 Vt. 403, 40 L. R. A. 428, 38 Atl. 81; State v. Richardson, 72 Vt. 49, 47 Atl. 103.

At least, when but one of the parties to the marriage intended to evade the statute. Ponsonford v. Johnson, 2 Blatchf. 51; Com. v. Lane, 113 Mass. 458, 18 Am. Rep. 509.

It is not entirely clear whether the decision in Williams v. Oates, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 535, is upon the ground that matrimonial capacity of the party is to be determined by the law of his domicile, or upon the ground that the case came within the principle that while marriages are generally to be judged by the lex loci contractus, every country must so far respect its own laws and their operation on its own citizens as not to allow them to be evaded by acts performed in another country, purposely to defraud them. The decision may perhaps be more safely referred to the latter ground than to the former, though some support for both may be found in the opinion.

Three distinct grounds for the decision in Stull's Estate, 183 Pa. 625, 39 L. R. A. 539, 39 Atl. 16, were assigned in the opinion, the combination of which were held to require a decision against the validity of the marriage, though the judge writing the opinion was disposed to regard each one of them as fatal to the marriage: (1) That the foreign marriage was contrary to the positive statute of the domicile; (2) that it was contrary to the public policy of the government of the domicile in that it offended against the prevailing sense of good morals among the people there dwelling; and (3) it was contracted for the express purpose of evading the positive law of the domicile, and was therefore to be regarded as a fraud upon the government and people of the domiciliary residence.

The decision in Pennegar v. State, 87 Tenn. 244, 2 L. R. A. 803, 10 S. W. 305, is upon the ground that the prohibitory statute is expressive of a distinctive state policy, and that the parties went out of the state of their domicile to evade the statute. (See further, as to this case, supra, III., a.)

In Carmena v. Blaney, 18 La. Ann. 245, it was also held that such a marriage would be invalid in Louisiana, where the parties were domiciled, and where the decree of divorce was rendered; but it does not clearly appear in this case that the marriage would be valid, even as tested by the law of Mississippi where it was celebrated.

In McLennan v. McLennan, 31 Or. 480, 38 L. R. A. 863, 50 Pac. 802, it was held that a marriage by a resident of Oregon before the expiration of the time allowed for an appeal from a decree of divorce obtained by her in that state was absolutely void, notwithstanding that it took place in another state. In this case, however, the statute provided that the decree should terminate the marriage, except that neither party should be capable of contracting marriage with a third person until the expiration of the period allowed for an appeal; and the court attempted to distinguish the decisions in other states which have upheld similar marriages upon the ground that the statutes there involved merely forbade the remarriage of the guilty party as a punishment, and were therefore penal in their nature, while the Oregon statute applies to the innocent as well as the guilty, and goes to the capacity of either party to marry within the prescribed time. It is to be observed, however, that the statutes involved in the cases referred to purport to make the remarriage absolutely void if celebrated within the state.

When the question first arose in New York it was held in Marshall v. Marshall, 2 Hun, 238, that the marriage would be invalid if the parties to the second marriage were domiciled in the state and went out of it to celebrate the marriage for the purpose of evading the statute, and immediately returned to the state and resided there. This decision, however, has been overruled by the subsequent cases in New York.

The right of the legislature of a state to make such a statute apply to marriages outside the state, of persons domiciled in the state, is conceded, even by the courts which refuse to give such effect to a statute which merely in general terms prohibits the marriage. Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N. Y. 18, 40 Am. Rep. 505; State v. Shattuck, 69 Vt. 403, 40 L. R. A. 428, 38 Atl. 81. The legislature of Massachusetts has enacted (Mass. Pub. Stat. 145, § 10) that where persons resident in the commonwealth, in order to evade any of the provisions of the preceding sections of the chapter, and with an intention of returning to reside in the commonwealth, go into another state or country and there have their marriage solemnized, and afterwards return and reside in the commonwealth, the marriage shall be deemed void in the commonwealth. It was held in Whippen v. Whippen, 171 Mass. 560, 51 N. E. 174, that to bring a case within the statute, both parties to the marriage must have intended to evade the provisions of the statute. So, in Com. v. Lane, 113 Mass. 458, 18 Am. Rep. 509, it was held that the statute did not apply, it not appearing that the parties went out of the state to celebrate the marriage in order to evade the provisions of the statute.

Where the parties to the subsequent marriage are not at the time thereof domiciled in the state where the divorce was rendered, it seems to be conceded that the statutory prohibition against remarriage does not apply if, notwithstanding such prohibition, the first marriage may be regarded as actually and the remarriage is celebrated in another state.

In Willey v. Willey, 22 Wash. 115, 60 Pac. 145, it was held that the provision of Wash. Code 1881, § 2008, that neither party to a decree of divorce shall be capable of marrying a third person until the expiration of the time for an appeal, or, if an appeal is taken within that time, until the cause has been fully determined, was penal, and did not apply to a common-law marriage contracted in California, where the parties to the subsequent marriage were domiciled, before the expiration of the time to appeal. The court took the position that the provision did not prevent the decree from becoming absolute before the expiration of the time to appeal, but merely made the parties incapable of marrying with a third person during that time.

In the last case it will be observed that the validity of the second marriage was passed upon by a court of the country which enacted the prohibitory statute. In Reed v. Hudson, 13 Ala. 570; Fuller v. Fuller, 40 Ala. 301; Wilson v. Holt, 83 Ala. 528, 3 So. 321; Phillips v. Madrid, 83 Me. 205, 12 L. R. A. 862, 22 Atl. 114; Roberts v. Ogdensburgh & L. C. R. Co. 34 Hun, 324; VanStorch v. Griffin, 71 Pa. 240; Dickson v. Dickson, 1 Yerg. 110, 24 Am. Dec. 444; and Frame v. Thormann, 102 Wis. 653, 79 N. W. 39,—it was also held that the prohibitory statute did not apply where the parties to the second marriage were, at the time of its celebration, domiciled and were married out of the state which enacted it, but in these cases the question was not passed upon by the court of the state which enacted the statute, though no special point is made of that fact.

The remarriage, in England, with a person domiciled in that country, of a woman for whose adultery a divorce was granted in Cape Colony, where, at the time, she was domiciled, will be held valid in England, notwithstanding that by the law of Cape Colony she was prohibited from remarrying during the lifetime of her former husband. Scott v. Atty. Gen. L. R. 11 Prob. Div. 128, 55 L. J. Prob. N. S. 57, 56 L. T. N. S. 924, 50 J. P. 824. The court, in this case, emphasized the fact that while the law of Cape Colony forbade the guilty party to remarry, yet, under that law, the decree of divorce dissolved and terminated the first marriage. In Warter v. Warter, L. R. 15 Prob. Div. 152, however, it was held that the remarriage in England of a woman after an Indian divorce to which she was a party could not be recognized as valid in England, notwithstanding that the other party to the second marriage was domiciled therein. The case is distinguished from Scott v. Atty. Gen. upon the ground that in that case the incapacity to remarry only attached to the guilty party, and was therefore penal in its character, while in the case at bar the Indian law did not completely dissolve the marriage tie until the lapse of the six months.

The Louisiana supreme court in Hernandez's Succession, 43 La. Ann. 962, 24 L. R. A. 831, 15 So. 461, held that the New York statute which forbids a subsequent marriage during the lifetime of the former spouse of a person for whose adultery a divorce has been granted was a penal statute, having no extraterritorial effect, and therefore did not annul a contract of marriage solemnized in that state between persons domiciled in Louisiana, one of whom had been divorced, on account of her adultery, by a decree of a court of the latter state. So, in Bullock v. Bullock, 122 Mass. 3; Clark v. Clark, 8 Cush. 385; and Phillips v. Madrid, 83 Me. 205, L. R. A. 862, 22 Atl. 114,—it was held that the statutory prohibition does not apply in case of divorce granted in another state. In Smith v. Woodworth, 44 Barb. 198, however, it was held that it was not necessary, in order to bring a case within that statute, that the first marriage shall have taken place in New York, or that it shall have been dissolved within that state. It does not appear where the parties to the second marriage were domiciled at the time it occurred.

In Simonds v. Allen, 33 Ill. App. 512, the rule that the validity of a marriage is to be tested by the law of the place where it occurred, was applied so as to hold invalid a marriage contracted in New York by a woman from whom, while domiciled in New York, her former husband had procured a divorce in Michigan upon service by publication only. The decision is upon the ground that the courts of New York have established the doctrine that the validity of such a foreign divorce against a person domiciled in New York will not be recognized in that state as valid, and that, therefore, the second marriage in New York was invalid according to the law of that place, and must therefore be deemed invalid by the court of Illinois irrespective of the question whether the Illinois courts would have recognized the foreign divorce and upheld the second marriage if it had occurred in that state.

In Crawford v. State, 73 Miss. 172, 35 L. R. A. 224, 18 So. 848, it was held that a marriage of a divorced person, during the lifetime of his former wife, in violation of a prohibitory statute of Alabama, was not void although it was celebrated in Alabama. The decision, however, is upon the ground that the Alabama statute merely forbade the marriage, but did not make it void.

The conclusion with respect to the remarriage of divorced persons contrary to a statute of the forum seems to be as follows: If the marriage is valid by the lex loci it will be held valid or invalid accordingly as the statute of the forum prohibiting such marriages is, or is not, regarded as a part of the public policy of the state. Thus far the public policy evinced by such a statute has never been held to extend to marriages between persons not at the time domiciled at the forum.

e. Former husband or wife living.

See also supra, II.

Although the general principles of Christendom which prevail in most civilized countries forbid the remarriage of a person having a husband or wife living and undivorced, yet a conflict of law sometimes arises with respect to the effect of such a remarriage. Thus, in some states and countries such a remarriage is voidable only, and not void ab initio, if the first husband or wife had been absent and unheard from for such a length of time as to raise the presumption of his or her death, while in other states or countries such a marriage would be deemed void ab initio. In People v. Crawford, 62 Hun, 160, 16 N. Y. Supp. 575, Affirmed in 133 N. Y. 535, 30 N. E. 1148, it was held that a statute of New Jersey making such a marriage void ab initio governed with respect to a marriage celebrated in New Jersey. It did not appear in this case, however, where the parties were domiciled at the time of the marriage. So, in Webster v. Webster, 58 N. H. 3, the effect of such a marriage was determined by reference to the law of Massachusetts where it was celebrated; and, in accordance with that law, it was held that the marriage was void, and that the woman could not, after the death of the man, be regarded as his widow. It does not appear in this case where the parties were domiciled at the time of the marriage, or what the effect of the marriage would 57 L. R. A.

have been if it had been celebrated in New Hampshire where the court was sitting, but in this case, as in the preceding case, the effect of the marriage was determined by reference to the lex loci.

The court in Kubanks v. Banks, 34 Ga. 407, did not deny that the validity of a second marriage contracted by a woman whose first husband was still living, but who had been away and not heard from for more than nineteen years, should be determined by the statute of North Carolina, where the second marriage took place; but, in the absence of any decision by the North Carolina courts to the contrary, it construed a statute of that state, which in terms forbade a second marriage while the other spouse of the first marriage was still living, not to, apply to a case where such spouse had not been heard from for a long period of years and was supposed to be dead, notwithstanding that the statute in question omitted a proviso which was embodied in an earlier statute expressly excepting such a case. There are some intimations in the opinion that if the statute had not been susceptible of such a construction, the court would have refused to apply it upon the ground that it was contrary to the public policy of the forum.

In Wilcox v. Wilcox, 46 Hun, 32, the court said that the rule that the law of the place where the marriage is celebrated governs, and if valid there is valid everywhere, and if void there is invalid everywhere, has its qualifications, and perhaps exceptions, which go in support of the marriage contract and relation, in so far that, as between citizens of one country, while in another, the marriage may be celebrated according to the laws of their domicile, and though not solemnized in the manner required by law may be treated as a contract to marry per verba de presenti, and treated as valid when followed by cohabitation and by reason of such cohabitation. In this case a marriage ceremony, between persons domiciled in New York state and who, after the ceremony, returned to that state and resided there, was performed in Montreal. According to the law of the latter place, the parties were not competent to marry because the woman had a former husband living, but they were competent according to the law of New York, because the former husband had been away and unheard from for a sufficient period to create a presumption of his death. It was not held in this case that a valid marriage was consummated by the ceremony performed in Montreal, but it was held that that ceremony was a circumstance from which the jury might infer that the subsequent cohabitation of the parties in New York was matrimonial, thus creating a common-law marriage.

The lex loci contractus governs the validity of a marriage, and if valid where consummated it must be held valid everywhere, and if invalid, a like result follows. Leonard v. Braswell, 99 Ky. 528, 36 L. R. A. 707, 36 S. W. 684. The parties were domiciled in Kentucky and went to Illinois for the sole purpose of being married there, and immediately returned to Kentucky and resided there. In this case, however, the marriage was invalid according to the law of either state, since the husband had a former wife living, and there was therefore no conflict of laws involved.

In Patterson v. Gaines, 6 How. 550, 12 L. ed. 553, it was held that it was not necessary to the validity of a second marriage that a sentence of dissolution should have been first pronounced against a third person who had contracted a bigamous marriage with the woman. The court said that that was the law of Pennsylvania where the second marriage took place, as well as of Louisiana, where the parties were domiciled and where the Federal court in which the action was brought was sitting.

1. Nonage; consent of parents or guardian.

See also Middleton v. Janverin, 2 Hagg. Const. 437; Canale v. People, 177 Ill. 219, 52 N. E. 310; and Ruding v. Smith, 2 Hagg. Const. 390, supra, I.

It is clear that, where the parties to a marriage were domiciled in the state or country where it took place, its validity, so far as it depends upon the consent of the parents of one or both parties, is to be tested by the law of that place, wherever the question may arise. Thus, in Hiram v. Pierce, 45 Me. 367, 71 Am. Dec. 555, it was held that the marriage of a minor in Massachusetts, where the parties were domiciled, not being invalid in that state, although it was without the consent of the parents of the minor as provided by the Massachusetts statute, would be held valid in Maine.

In Harford v. Morris, 2 Hagg. Const. 423, the consistory court held that the validity of a marriage in a foreign country between domiciled British subjects, without the consent of the parents or guardian of the woman, who was of tender age, must be determined by the law of England; and the marriage was held valid, although it would have been invalid according to the law of the country where it took place. The decision in this case, as shown by a note appended to the report of it in 2 Hagg. Const. 436, was reversed by the high court of delegates, but from the note it would seem that the reversal was upon the ground that the woman was induced to enter into the marriage through fear.

In Scrimshire v. Scrimshire, 2 Hagg. Const. 395, however, it was held that a clandestine marriage in France between British subjects, both of whom were under the age at which they were competent to marry without the consent of their parents, being null and void according to the law of France, would be regarded as null and void in England, notwithstanding that, according to the law of the latter country, the marriage would be irregular, but not null.

Whether the failure to obtain the consent of the parents as required by the lex loci will invalidate a marriage between persons domiciled in another country, where such consent is not required, the weight of authority seems to be that the failure to obtain such a consent when required by the lex domicilii will not invalidate a marriage celebrated in another country where such consent is not required.

Thus, in Steele v. Braddell, Milw. Const. 1, it was held that the provisions of 9 George II., chap. 11, for annulling the marriage of a minor, had without the consent of parent or guardian, did not apply to a marriage contracted in Scotland, although the parties left Ireland to celebrate it in order to avoid the act, and returned the next day. Dr. Radcliff took the position that the case could not be brought within the statute, either by virtue of the terms of the statute, or the intended evasion of the same.

So, also, in the following cases courts of the state or country of the domicile of the parties have upheld the validity of marriages between minors, celebrated in a foreign state or country, according to the law of which the marriages were valid, notwithstanding that they were celebrated without the consent of parents or guardians, as required by the lex domicilii. Compton v. Bearchcroft, Bull. N. P. 114; Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 2 Hagg. Const. 54; Swift 57 L. R. A.

v. Kelly, 3 Knapp, 257; Com. v. Graham, 157 Mass. 73, 16 L. R. A. 578, 31 N. E. 706; Courtright v. Courtright, 26 Ohio L. J. 309. In the first and the last two cases it expressly appeared that the parties left the state of their domicile to celebrate the marriage for the very purpose of evading the law of the domicile, but the marriage was nevertheless held valid.

In Com. v. Graham, 157 Mass. 73, 16 L. R. A. 578, 31 N. E. 706, the court said: "The general rule of law is that marriage contracted elsewhere, if valid where it is contracted, is held valid here, although the parties intended to evade our laws, unless the statutes declare such a marriage void, or the marriage is one deemed 'contrary to the law of nature as generally recognized in Christian countries.'" At the time of this decision there was a statute (Mass. Pub. Stat. 145, § 10) providing that under certain circumstances a marriage solemnized in another state by persons resident in the commonwealth, who go into the other state for the purpose of having the marriage solemnized there and afterwards return to and reside in the commonwealth, should be deemed void; but the case at bar was held not to be within the statute.

In Heller v. Heller, 28 Chicago Leg. News, 288, two persons, domiciled in Illinois, in order to avoid the provision of the Illinois statute which requires a license if the woman is under the age of eighteen, and prohibits the issuance of a license without the consent of the parents, went into the state of Wisconsin and were there married, immediately returning to Illinois. The marriage was held valid notwithstanding that the woman was under the age of eighteen. The decision, however, is upon the ground that the marriage would not have been invalid for noncompliance with the Illinois statute, even if it had been celebrated in Illinois. The implication of the opinion is that if the effect of the statute had been to invalidate marriages performed within the state in violation of its provisions, such effect could not have been evaded by going out of the state for that purpose.

In Simonlu v. Mallac, 2 Swabey & T. 67, 29 L. J. Mat. N. S. 97, 6 Jur. N. S. 561, 2 L. T. N. S. 327, it was held that a marriage in England, valid according to the law of England, of persons domiciled in France, was valid, notwithstanding that the law of France (lex domicilii) with reference to the observance of certain formalities, and obtaining the consent of parents, was not complied with. This position was taken, even on the assumption that by the law of France the marriage would be void because of noncompliance with such requirements. This case was distinguished in Sottomayer v. DeBarros, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 1, 47 L. J. Prob. N. S. 23, 26 Week. Rep. 455, III., a. supra (which adopted the general doctrine that the lex domicilii governs as to matrimonial capacity), upon the ground that the matter of consent went to the ceremony, rather than the capacity of the parties.

A statute of Massachusetts declaring void a marriage when either party is under the age of consent, if they separate during such nonage, has no relevancy to a marriage performed in another state, although between citizens of Massachusetts. Everett v. Morrison, 69 Hun, 140, 23 N. Y. Supp. 377, Denying Rehearing in 50 N. Y. S. R. 33, 21 N. Y. Supp. 328.

And, on the other hand, it was held in McDeed v. McDeed, 67 Ill. 545, that such a marriage, celebrated in Ohio, between persons domiciled there, being void under the law of that state, must be held void in Illinois, rendering the children of the marriage incapable of inheriting real property of the father in the latter state. The decision in this case was expressly on the ground that the lex loci governed.

In Smith v. Smith, 84 Ga. 440, 8 L. R. A. 362, 11 S. E. 496, the Georgia supreme court held that the effect of a marriage between persons, under the age of consent, domiciled in Georgia, who went to Alabama to have the ceremony performed in order to evade the law of Georgia, was to be determined by reference to the law of Georgia, and not by the law of Alabama; but in this case there was a statute of Georgia which expressly provided that parties residing in that state could not evade any of the provisions of its laws as to marriage by going into another state for the solemnization of the marriage ceremony.

IV. Summary.

The foregoing review of the authorities seems to warrant the following general propositions:

(1) So far as the validity of a marriage depends on the preliminaries or the manner or form of its solemnization, a marriage valid where celebrated is valid everywhere; and to this rule, when confined strictly to preliminaries or matters of form or ceremony, there seem to be no exceptions. Supra, I.

(2) So far as the validity of a marriage depends on the preliminaries or the manner or form of solemnization, a marriage invalid where celebrated is, in general, invalid everywhere; but this rule is subject to the exception that, under certain circumstances, as where compliance with the lex loci is impossible, a marriage in a foreign country will be upheld if celebrated in accordance with the lex domicilii, though not in accordance with the lex loci. Supra, I. The rule is also subject to further exception, under some circumstances, with reference to marriages performed at foreign consulates. Supra, I.

(3) A polygamous marriage, at least if it is a second or subsequent marriage, will not be recognized as valid in other countries, though valid according to the law of the place where celebrated. Supra, II. But there is a difference of opinion whether the first marriage will be recognized when it contemplated that the husband might take other wives during its continuance. Supra, II. The American decisions thus far seem to uphold the first marriage and the English decisions condemn it.

(4) The mere fact that by the law or custom of the place where a marriage was celebrated it is dissolvable at the pleasure of the parties, does not, according to the American authorities at least, exclude it from the general principle that a marriage valid where celebrated is valid everywhere; but there are dicta in England to the contrary effect. Supra, II.

(5) The doctrine that best accords with the decisions, though there is a decided conflict of authority on the point, is that the lex loci governs with respect to the matrimonial capacity of the parties, as well as with respect to the manner or form of solemnization. Supra, III. a. In any event, however, this doctrine is subject to two general exceptions: the first relating to marriages which are incestuous according to the general consent of Christendom, more specifically marriages between persons in the direct lineal line of consanguinity, and in the collateral line, between brothers and sisters (supra, III., b); the second relating to marriages which are contrary to the statute of the forum (that is contrary to a statute of the forum which contemplates marriages celebrated elsewhere), or to the distinctive public policy of the forum. Supra, III., a. The second of these exceptions is applicable to a variety of circumstances which may affect the capacity of the parties. Its application to different classes of cases is shown in III. b, c, d, e, and f, supra. By this exception the distinctive public policy of the forum only, and not that of any other place, is applied, and when the marriage is not opposed to that distinctive policy it will be upheld or condemned accordingly as it is valid or invalid by the lex loci, assuming that it is not contrary to the general principles of Christendom. The place of the domicile of the parties at the time of the marriage may be an important element in the application of this exception, since there may be a distinctive policy of the forum which would condemn a marriage, though celebrated elsewhere, between persons domiciled at the forum, but which would not condemn a similar marriage between persons not domiciled at the forum; but, upon the other hand, the fact that the parties were not at the time domiciled at the forum is not conclusive that the distinctive public policy of the forum does not condemn the marriage, when the question of its validity arises in the forum. In some of the cases the decisions condemning marriages celebrated elsewhere between persons domiciled at the forum are apparently referred to the principle that the lex domicilii, and not the lex loci, governs with respect to matrimonial capacity; but, as pointed out in III. a, supra, most of these decisions are, at least so far as their facts are concerned, explainable upon the theory that the marriage in question was contrary to the distinctive public policy of the forum. When that is the case, it is, of course, immaterial for practical purposes whether the lex domicilii or the lex loci be regarded as the general doctrine, since, even if the latter be adopted as such, it will not apply to the particular case. When, however, the marriage is not contrary to the distinctive public policy of the forum, it may be of vital importance whether the lex loci or the lex domicilii is adopted as the test of matrimonial capacity, and it is apparent that cases of this kind are entitled to greater weight upon the question whether the lex loci or the lex domicilii governs, than cases in which it was not necessary to choose between the two. When due attention is paid to this distinction, it is believed that the weight of authority, in America at least, will be found to establish the lex loci rather than the lex domicilii as the general test of matrimonial capacity, subject to the exceptions referred to. A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing an order of a Trial Term for New York County setting aside a verdict in favor of plaintiff and granting a new trial in an action brought to recover for alleged breach of contract to purchase certain corporate stock. Reversed.

Statement by Parker, Ch. J.:

Prior to September 3, 1895, the defendant, an officer of the Hoffman Machine Company, tried to persuade the plaintiff to purchase stock in that company; but, his efforts proving unsuccessful, he finally said to plaintiff: "Page, I want you to be in that company. I know it is a good thing. I am so anxious to have you that I will guarantee you against loss if you will take stock in that company and subscribe. I will do further, in fact. I will give you a bonus of my own shares in addition." On these conditions plaintiff consented to purchase stock of the par value of $5,000, whereupon defendant delivered to him this writing, which was in accord with their oral agreement:

New York, Sept. 3d, 1895.

J. Seaver Page, Esq.,
City.

My dear Mr. Page:—

In consideration of your having subscribed $5,000 to the proposed Hoffman Machine Co., I hereby agree, if requested so to do by you on the 1st day of January, 1897, within ten days thereafter, to pay to you the amount paid by you upon such subscription, upon condition of your assigning and transferring to me all the shares of stock and rights and privileges you have received or are entitled to receive by virtue of said subscription, and also the stock of such company, viz., $1,000 par value which I have agreed to deliver to you out of my own personal holdings when issued.

Very truly yours,
Ralph L. Shainwald.

On November 5, 1896, this agreement was extended to the 1st day of January, 1898, so that thereafter the agreement between the parties was that the defendant agreed, if requested by the plaintiff on the 1st day of January, 1898, to pay the amount provided for in the original agreement. The plaintiff did not tender the stock to defendant and make a demand of him on the 1st day of January, 1898, nor did he until the 3d day of January, and one of his claims upon the trial and upon this review is that, New Year's Day being a holiday, it was not necessary for him to make the demand on that day, and that in the year 1898 the succeeding day was Sunday, and hence his demand on the 3d was in time. On the 3d day of January plaintiff called upon the defendant 57 L. R. A.

at his office, and tendered to him the stock which he held under the agreement, and at the same time handed to him a letter, which read as follows:

New York, January 3, 1898.

Ralph L. Shainwald, Esq.

Dear Sir:—

In accordance with your agreement with me, as set forth in your letters to me bearing date, respectively, September 3d, 1895, and November 5th, 1896, I do hereby tender you an assignment and transfer to you of all the shares of stock, rights, and privileges which I have received, or which I would be entitled to receive, by virtue of my subscription to the stock of the Hoffman Machine Company, together with $1,000 par value of stock of the Hoffman Machine Company, which you delivered to me out of your personal holdings, and I hereby respectfully demand the return and payment to me of the sum which I have subscribed and paid for all of such stock, namely, the sum of $5,000, and this tender and demand is made as of the present date, and as of the 1st day of January, 1898, as provided for in our contract.

Very respectfully,
J. Seaver Page.

The defendant read the letter and then said, "Page, now I intend to do what is fair and just in this matter, and you must give me a little time to consider it." The next day the defendant wrote to plaintiff a letter reading as follows:

New York, January 4th, 1898.

J. Seaver Page, Esq.
City.

Dear Sir:—

I return herewith the shares you left in my office yesterday, since I do not wish to be the custodian of property belonging to you.

Yours very truly,
Ralph L. Shainwald.

To this letter the plaintiff made the following reply:

101 Fulton Street, January 5, '98.

My Dear Mr. Shainwald:—

I have received your favor returning me the stock of the Hoffman Machine Co. I am sorry you have taken this position, as I do not think it is a tenable one. I should very much prefer to come to some amicable decision with you before I am compelled to proceed further.

Yours truly,
J. Seaver Page.

Some time during that month the defendant called upon the plaintiff, and in a conversation with him offered to give him his note for $2,500, an offer prompted, as the defendant says, by his belief at the time that the stock investment was still good for 50 cents on a dollar.

Mr. John S. Davenport, with Mr. Felix Jellenik, for appellant:

Messrs. John M. Bowers and James W. Gerard, for respondent:

Even if the tender of the stock and the demand made on January 3, 1898, were not a strict performance according to the contract, the defendant has waived his right to object to such tender and demand.

The tender of the stock by the plaintiff, and his demand from the defendant of the $5,000 paid, on the 3d day of January, 1898, was valid and was sufficient to bind the defendant.

The agreement by which the defendant gave to the plaintiff an extension of his time to make a tender of the stock and a demand for repayment of the $5,000, to January 1, 1898, was valid and binding upon the defendant.

Parker, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The legal effect of the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant was to require the defendant, if requested so to do by the plaintiff on the 1st day of January, 1898, to take plaintiff's stock in the Hoffman Machine Company at the price named therein. The plaintiff failed to tender his stock and make the request on the day named, but did so on the 3d of January. As the 1st day of January was a holiday, and the 2d came on Sunday, the plaintiff insists that his tender and request were in time. But the difficulty with his contention is that legal holidays have not been placed on the same basis as Sunday by the statute. Indeed, in only two respects has the legislature attempted to interfere with the ordinary course of business, whether public or private, on a holiday other than Sunday. The first act provides that a negotiable instrument maturing on a holiday is payable on the next succeeding business day (Laws 1887, chap. 280), and the second that holidays shall be considered as Sunday for all purposes whatsoever, as regards the transaction of business in the public offices of the state or of the counties of the state (Laws 1897, chap. 614, § 1). If the legislature had omitted the limitation of the preceding statute to the transaction of business in the public offices of the state or counties of the state, thus providing that holidays should be considered as Sunday for all purposes whatsoever, the plaintiff's contention would be well founded. But in the present state of the statutes we are of the opinion that upon holidays other than Sunday all transactions may be carried on as on any other day, with the exceptions above noted. And so we said, in effect, in Walton v. Stafford, 162 N. Y. 558, 57 N. E. 92. It is undoubtedly true that the state of the law on this subject is likely to prove embarrassing to many, such for instance as those who find themselves obliged to tender a considerable sum of money on a day which is just enough of a holiday to allow the banks to close, from which he must obtain the money to make a tender, but not enough of a holiday to avoid the necessity of a tender if he would not breach his contract. But such faults, if faults they be, in our business law, can be corrected only by the legislature.

The plaintiff's further contention is that he is entitled to recover because the defendant waived his right to object that such tender and demand was not made on the proper day, and in that respect the appellate division seems to have agreed with him. We are unable to concur in that view. The plaintiff's right to require the defendant to take and pay for his stock was lost when he allowed January 1st, 1898, to pass by without tendering to him that stock, and demanding the payment of the agreed price. Thereafter the contract was at an end, and the situation was precisely the same as if there had never been one. Either party had a right, of course, to undertake negotiations to revive the old contract or make a new one, but such a purpose could only be accomplished by a meeting of minds in agreement as to what the new contract should be, whether on the basis of the old or on entirely different lines. Now, the parties did not come to any agreement, and about this fact they do not differ. Two days after the contract had ceased to have life, the plaintiff made a demand in writing, and tendered the stock, but the defendant replied, "You must give me a little time to consider it," and the next day he returned the stock, as was his legal right. A little later the defendant offered to give the plaintiff his note for $2,500, as he explained, on the condition that the plaintiff would take the risk as to the rest of his investment, which he thought the stock might prove to be worth. The plaintiff did not accept this offer, and so their conferences ended without the making of a different agreement from the old or the renewing of its life, and in such case the plaintiff must fail to recover, because he has no contract to enforce. The doctrine of waiver, often applied in cases of forfeiture, has no place in this discussion, for there was nothing to forfeit January 3d, when the plaintiff tendered the stock. The contract upon which he was apparently relying was dead, and had been for two days, and, whether he realized it or not, the plaintiff was in fact a suitor for the enjoyment of a second option. The defendant refused to accord it to him, and there the matter must end, so far as the courts are concerned, for it was the defendant's legal right to refuse.

The judgment of the Appellate Division should be reversed, and the order of the trial court affirmed, with costs to abide the event.

Cullem, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant claimed that while driving in Central Park, in the city of New York, both his person and his vehicle were injured in consequence of collision with a gravel heap placed on the road through the negligence of the defendant. Thereupon he brought an action against the defendant in the court of common pleas to recover damages for the injury to his person. Subsequently he brought another action in one of the district courts in the city of New York to recover for the injury to his vehicle. In this last action he obtained judgment, which was paid by the defendant. Thereafter the defendant set up by supplemental answer the judgment in the district court suit, and its satisfaction, as a bar to the further maintenance of the action in the common pleas. On the trial of the case in the supreme court, to which, under the Constitution, the action was transferred, it was held that the plaintiff's right of action was merged in the judgment recovered in the district court, and his complaint was dismissed. The judgment entered upon this direction was affirmed by the appellate division, and an appeal has been taken to this court by allowance.

The rule is that a single or entire cause of action cannot be subdivided into several claims, and separate actions maintained thereon. Scoor v. Sturgis, 16 N. Y. 548; Nathans v. Hope, 77 N. Y. 420. As to this principle there is no dispute. Therefore the question presented by this appeal is whether, from the defendant's negligence, and the injury occasioned thereby to the plaintiff in his person and his property, there arose a single cause of action, or two causes of action,—one for the injury to his person, and the other for injury to his property. The question is not determined by the Code of Civil Procedure, for, though in § 484 it prescribes what separate causes of action may be joined in the same complaint, it nowhere assumes to define what is a single cause of action. Nor is there any controlling decision of this court on the point. In Mulligan v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. (affirmed without opinion) 109 N. Y. 657, 16 N. E. 684, the question discussed in the opinion of the learned court below, and necessarily involved in the decision of this court, was the effect of a release which the plaintiff asserted was intended to cover only the injuries to his property, but was fraudulently prepared so as to embrace his whole cause of action. The case is doubtless authority for the proposition that a voluntary settlement between the parties of part of a claim does not satisfy or discharge the whole claim. But the principle that the parties may, by voluntary agreement, sever or split up a single cause of action, though a plaintiff cannot of his own volition do the same, seems to be generally recognized even in those jurisdictions where the rule is held most firmly that a single tort gives rise but to a single cause of action. O'Beirne v. Lloyd, 43 N. Y. 248; Bliss v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 160 Mass. 447, 36 N. E. 65.

The question now before us has been the subject of conflicting decisions in different jurisdictions. In England it has been held by the court of appeal (Lord Coleridge, Ch. J., dissenting) that damages to the person and to property, though occasioned by the same wrongful act, give rise to different causes of action (Brunsdon v. Humphrey, L. R. 14 Q. B. Div. 141), while in Massachusetts, Minnesota, and Missouri the contrary doctrine has been declared (Doran v. Cohen, 147 Mass. 342, 17 N. E. 647; King v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 80 Minn. 83, 50 L. R. A. 161, 82 N. W. 1113; Von Fragstein v. Windler, 2 Mo. App. 598). The argument of those courts which maintain that an injury to person and property creates but a single cause of action is that, as the defendant's wrongful act was single, the cause of action must be single, and that the different injuries occasioned by it are merely items of damage proceeding from the same wrong; while that of the English court is that the negligent act of the defendant in itself constitutes no cause of action, and becomes an actionable wrong only out of the damage which it causes. "One wrong was done as soon as the plaintiff's enjoyment of his property was substantially interfered with. A further wrong arose as soon as the driving also caused injury to the plaintiff's person." Brunsdon v. Humphrey, L. R. 14 Q. B. Div. 141. I doubt whether either argument is conclusive. If, where one person was driving the vehicle of another, both the driver and the vehicle were injured, there can be no doubt that two causes of action would arise,—one in favor of the person injured, and the other in favor of the owner of the injured property. On the other hand, if both the horse and the vehicle, being the property of the same person, were injured, there would be but a single cause of action for the damage to both. If, while injury to the horse and vehicle of a person gives rise to but a single cause of action, injury to the vehicle and its owner gives rise to two causes of action, it must be because there is an essential difference between an injury to the person and an injury to property, that makes it impracticable, or at least very inconvenient in the administration of justice, to blend the two. We think there is such a distinction. Different periods of limitation apply. The plaintiff's action for personal injuries is barred by the lapse of three years; that for injury to the property not till the lapse of six years. The plaintiff cannot assign his right of action for the injury to his person, and it would abate and be lost by his death before a recovery of a verdict, and, if the defendant were a natural person, also by his death before that time. On the other hand, the right of action for injury to property is assignable, and would survive the death of either party. It may be seized by creditors on a bill in equity (Hudson v. Piets, 11 Paige, 180), and would pass to an assignee in bankruptcy. Possibly the difficulties arising from the difference in the periods of limitation and the difference in the rule of survival between a personal injury and a property injury might be obviated in practice by holding the statute a bar to that portion of the damages, a claim for which would have been outlawed had it been a separate cause of action, and by permitting, in case of death, the action to be revived so far as it relates to property. We do not see, however, how it would be practicable to deal with a case where the right of action for injury to the property had passed to an assignee in bankruptcy, or to a receiver on a creditors' bill, without treating it as an independent cause of action. Though, as we have already said, § 484 of the Code does not expressly determine the point in issue, still, it is not without much force in the argument that the two injuries constitute separate causes of action. Under the old Code of Procedure, at the time of its original enactment injuries to person and injuries to property were separately classified as causes of action, and it was not permitted to join those of one class with those of another. Code Proc. § 167. By an amendment in 1852, injuries to persons and property were put in the same class. But by § 484 of the Code of Civil Procedure they are again placed in distinct classes, and cannot be united. If the plaintiff's cause of action is single, into what class does it fall? Is it for an injury to the person, which may be united with other causes of action for personal injuries, or is it for injury to property, which may be joined with claims of 57 L. R. A.

the same nature, or is it sui generis, a non-descript which must stand alone?

While some of the difficulties in the joinder of a claim for injury to the person and one for injury to the property in one cause of action are created by our statutory enactments, the history of the common law shows that the distinction between torts to the person and torts to property has always obtained. Lord Justice Bowen, in the Brunsdon Case, has pointed out that there is no authority in the books for the proposition that a recovery for trespass to the person is a bar to an action for trespass to goods, or vice versa. It is true that at common law the necessity of bringing two suits could, at the election of the plaintiff, be obviated in some cases,—as, for instance, by declaring for trespass on the plaintiff's close, and alleging in aggravation thereof an assault upon his person. See Waterman, Trespass, 205, 406. Still, in such a case there would be but a single cause of action, to wit, the trespass upon the close; and, if the defendant justified this trespass, it would be a complete defense to the action; the personal assault being merely a matter of aggravation. Carpenter v. Barber, 44 Vt. 441. Therefore, for reason of the great difference between the rules of law applicable to injuries of the person and those relating to injuries to property, we conclude that an injury to person and one to property, though resulting from the same tortious act, constitute different causes of action.

The judgment appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial granted; costs to abide the event.

v.

John S. BIESECKER, Resp't.

(169 N. Y. 53.)

The legislature cannot prohibit the sale of dairy products containing a preservative other than salt, sugar, or spirituous liquors in specified cases, or the sale of preservatives for such use, when the use of preservatives is not declared to be an adulteration, and the statute is not aimed at adulteration generally, regardless of whether or not their effect is to render the products unwholesome.

Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for New York County which sustained a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover the penalty for violation of a statute against the use of preservatives in dairy products. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Samuel S. Slater and John C. Davies, Attorney General, for appellant:
The prohibition against the sale of dairy products containing a preservative is constitutional if enacted to protect the public health or to prevent fraud.

The prohibition against the sale of dairy products containing a preservative is for the protection of the public health. Any dairy product containing a preservative is harmful to the public health.

People v. Cipperly, 37 Hun, 324.

The prohibition of the sale of a dairy product containing a preservative was enacted to prevent deception. Even if all preservatives are harmless, their sale can be prohibited to prevent fraud.

People v. Girard, 145 N. Y. 105, 39 N. E. 823.

Messrs. Edward Lauterbach, Henry L. Scheuerman, and Herbert R. Limburger, for respondent:

Section 27 of the agricultural law is unconstitutional. The act in question deprives persons of their "life, liberty, and property without due process of law" within the meaning of the constitutional provision.

Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636.

Even if the legislature, under the guise of a health law, attempts to interfere with personal liberty and the exercise of a lawful calling, the act by which it attempts to do so cannot be sustained as constitutional unless it is apparent on the face thereof that it has relation to the public health, and that the provisions of the act are appropriate and adapted to that end.

The prohibition of the sale of beneficial preservatives which have been in use for many years in this state cannot in any way benefit the public health. The term "preservative" itself signifies something having a preserving quality and beneficial effect; preservation is the antithesis of decay.

The legislature has no right to prohibit this defendant from exercising the lawful calling of manufacturing or selling preservatives, a business in which thousands have been engaged for years past.

In view of the existence of a provision of law prohibiting adulteration and the introduction of unwholesome or adulterated substances into food and dairy products, it cannot be claimed that the statute under consideration in the case at bar was intended or necessary to prevent adulteration.

People v. Hills, 64 App. Div. 584, 72 N. Y. Supp. 340.

Oullen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought to recover a penalty for the violation of § 27 of the agricultural law (Laws 1893, chap. 338), as amended by chapter 534 of the Laws of 1900. The provisions of that section which it is alleged the defendant violated are as follows: "No person shall sell, offer or expose for sale, any butter or other dairy products containing a preservative, but this shall not be construed to prohibit the use of salt in butter or cheese, or spirituous liquors in club or other fancy cheese or sugar in condensed milk. No person or persons, firm, association, or corporation shall induce or attempt to induce any person or persons to violate any of the provisions of the agricultural law. Any person, firm, association, or corporation selling, offering, or advertising for sale any substance, preparation, or matter for use in violation of the provisions of the agricultural law shall be guilty of a violation of this act." The complaint merely follows the statutes, and alleges that the defendant advertised for sale a preservative call "preservaline" for use with butter, "which was neither salt used in butter or cheese, sugar to be used in milk, nor liquor to be used in club or fancy cheese," with intent that the said preservaline should be used in butter to be offered and exposed for sale. The defendant demurred to the complaint, claiming that the statutory enactment quoted was unconstitutional and void, and in this contention he has been upheld by the special term and the appellate division.

We think the disposition of this case by the courts below was correct. It is not possible to define accurately the limits of the police power, the exercise of which is vested in the legislature; nor have the courts, as a rule, essayed that task, further than to state in very general terms the nature and object of such power. Still, the power has its limitations, and those limitations have been to a large extent determined by the process of exclusion and inclusion, as the courts have upheld particular cases of legislation as valid exercise of the power, and in other cases have declared the legislation void. In People v. Marx, 99 N. Y. 377, 52 Am. Rep. 34, 2 N. E. 29, a statute absolutely prohibiting the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine or any compound as a substitute for butter and cheese was held void. The statute, having been subsequently amended so as to prohibit the manufacture or sale of any article so compounded as to imitate butter, was upheld in People v. Arensberg, 105 N. Y. 123, 59 Am. Rep. 483, 11 N. E. 277, as valid legislation to prevent fraud on purchasers and consumers. In People v. Kilber, 106 N. Y. 321, 12 N. E. 795, a statute defining what should be deemed unwholesome or adulterated milk, and prohibiting its sale, was held constitutional. In People v. Girard, 145 N. Y. 105, 39 N. E. 823, a statute forbidding the manufacture or sale of vinegar containing any artificial coloring matter was also held valid. From these cases the following propositions may be deduced: (1) That the legislature cannot forbid or wholly prevent the sale of a wholesome article of food. (2) That legislation intended and reasonably adapted to prevent an article being manufactured in imitation or semblance of a well-known article in common use, and thus imposing upon consumers or purchasers, is valid. (3) That, in the interest of public health, the legislature may declare articles of food not complying with a specified standard unwholesome, and forbid their sale. Though these principles, like most legal principles, are true only within limits, there would not seem much chance of conflict in their practical application, except between the first and last. In the first of the Milk Cases (People v. Cipperly, 101 N. Y. 634, 4 N. E. 107, decided upon opinion of Learned, P. J., in 37 Hun, 319) it was held that the statutory declaration of what was wholesome milk was conclusive, and the defendant was not allowed to show in defense that the milk sold by him was in fact unadulterated and not unwholesome. The first Oleomargarine Case can be differentiated from this on the ground that the statute forbade its sale as a substitute to take the place of butter, and not as an unwholesome article of food. Still, that distinction is narrow, and I imagine that the sale and consumption of a well-known article of food, or a product conclusively shown to be wholesome, could not be forbidden by the legislature, even though it assumed to enact the law in the interest of public health. The limits of the police power must necessarily depend in many instances on the common knowledge of the times. An enactment of a standard of purity of an article of food, failing to comply with which the sale of the article is illegal, to be valid, must be within reasonable limits, and not of such a character as to practically prohibit the manufacture or sale of that which, as a matter of common knowledge, is good and wholesome. The statute before us cannot be justified as an exercise of power to prevent fraud or imposition on buyers and consumers. Doubtless the legislature could provide that, where butter contained any preservative except salt or sugar, the package should be clearly marked with a label stating such fact; and it might require any notice adapted to informing the public of the nature and treatment of the article offered for sale. This it has not done, but it has absolutely forbidden the sale. Nor is the legislation similar to that before the court in the Vinegar Case. In that case there was no prohibition of vinegar produced from other materials than cider. The forbidden thing was the use of artificial coloring matter, which was not a necessary ingredient of the article produced, but served the sole purpose of preventing the consumer distinguishing between the different kinds of vinegar. In the present case the object of the forbidden article used is not to practise any deception, but to prevent decay in a product which, without the presence of some foreign substance, naturally becomes unfit for use in a very short period. The effect, therefore, of the statute, is to prohibit the preservation of dairy products, except by salt in butter and cheese, and sugar in condensed milk, and their sale, no matter how harmless the ingredients used for that purpose may be, and no matter how efficiently they attain their purpose.

It is sought, however, to uphold this statute under the principle of the Milk Cases, on the theory that it is a legislative determination that preservatives other than salt and sugar are unwholesome adulterations of dairy products. As pointed out by the learned courts below, there is no legislative declaration to that effect. Passing, however, that consideration, there is a more serious difficulty in the way of such a course. If the statute had provided that the admixture of any substance with dairy products other than salt or sugar should be deemed an adulteration, and declared such dairy products when so adulterated unwholesome, the case would resemble the Milk Case, and the question would be presented whether such far-reaching restrictions could be upheld as reasonable regulations in favor of public health. As to that question we express no opinion. But this provision of the statute is not aimed at adulterations. I cannot find in the agricultural law any general prohibition against adulterations in butter and cheese, although there is an express provision to that effect in the case of milk. Section 26 seems to forbid the use of acids or other deleterious substances only in the case of imitation butter. Though, if I err in this, and the application of the section be general, the provision under review is unnecessary so far as public health is involved. Section 407 of the Penal Code forbids the sale of adulterated food only (except in certain specified cases) when made without disclosing or informing the purchaser of the adulteration. It will be seen, therefore, that the sale of adulterated butter or cheese is not necessarily an offense, except so far as made such by the statutory enactment under review. That enactment does not make the introduction of a foreign substance an adulteration, nor an adulteration illegal, except in the case of a preservative. How, then, can it be said that the statute is intended to prevent adulteration, or the introduction of a foreign substance into butter or cheese, when the sole test of criminality under it is that the substance is introduced for the object or with the effect of preserving butter or cheese? If the foreign substance has not this effect, no matter how deleterious it may be, the use of it does not violate this provision. It is plain, therefore, that this statute is solely aimed at the preservation of dairy products by the use of other substances than salt, sugar, and spirituous liquor. Why the use of sugar is forbidden in milk, salt in butter and cheese, and particularly why that of liquor is permitted in club or fancy cheese, and forbidden in other cheese, it is difficult to understand on the theory that its object was the protection of the public health. The preservation of food and the arrest of its tendency to decay is certainly a proper and lawful object in itself. It is a work in which man has been engaged, to some extent, from earliest history. It is the subject of large industries in this country, and the products of those industries are generally used by the community, and are lawful objects of manufacture and sale. The industry has grown to an enormous extent. These are matters of common knowledge. There is doubtless in the prosecution of these industries danger of adulteration, and of the use of processes injurious to public health. The regulation of these subjects for the protection of the public health and the prevention of imposition on consumers is within the power of the legislature, and the propriety of its exercise cannot be questioned. But, while it may regulate, the legislature may not destroy, the industry; and that is not a valid regulation, which, in dealing with the means of preserving food, makes the preservation of food itself an unlawful act. Ingredients and processes may be prohibited as unwholesome or causing deception, but not solely because they preserve.

The judgment appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Ohio ex rel. F. S. MONNETT, Attorney General,

v.

CAPITAL CITY DAIRY COMPANY.

(62 Ohio St. 350.)

1. The police power of the state is properly exercised in the prevention of deception in the sale of dairy products, and in the protection of the health of the people; and it is within the scope of this power to regulate the manufacture and sale of articles of food, even though the right to manufacture and sell such articles is a natural right guaranteed by the Constitution.

2. The acts of March 7, 1890 (87 Ohio Laws, p. 51), and of May 16, 1894 (91 Ohio Laws, p. 274), and of May 17, 1888 (83 Ohio Laws, p. 178), as amended March 21, 1887 (84 Ohio Laws, p. 182), and of March 20, 1884 (81 Ohio Laws, p. 67), the purpose of which acts is to prevent deception in the sale of dairy products and to preserve the public health, are a reasonable exercise of the police power, and do not contravene any section of the Constitution.

3. The mere fact that the criminal laws of the state provide for the punishment, by fine, of those who offend against the above-recited sections, is not a bar to a proceeding in quo warranto to oust a corporation engaged in the manufacture of oleomargarine from the exercise of its right to be a corporation.

4. Where the manner of conducting a business which the state's charter gives power to a company to conduct as a corporation is in disregard and defiance of the laws of the state relating to that business, an abuse of the power results, and quo warranto may properly be invoked to stop the abuse, and, if the abuse be flagrant, to oust the corporation.

1. "It is proper for the state to prohibit the manufacture or sale of any substance which may or might be used instead of butter."

2. "Assuming that the prohibition of apple sauce, currant jelly, or pulverized sugar is not included in the above, then it is held that the prohibition is still effective against any compound, however harmless or nutritious, which in general appearance resembles butter, whether such resemblance be intended or accidental."

3. "Oleomargine may be lawfully made, but it must not be colored in imitation of yellow butter made from unadulterated milk or cream."

The first and second of these propositions are no longer seriously defended.

The only coloring matter the defendant is accused of using is derived from the harmless South American berry, annatto. Annatto, therefore, not being deleterious to public health, and there being of course many other coloring matters, including oleo oil and lactochrome, equally so, a statute forbidding the use of annatto or any other harmless coloring matter cannot be upheld as a sanitary regulation.

It is impossible to prevent oleomargarine from looking like, or appearing to be, butter in its natural state, unless it is purposely disfigured by coloration. If the product resembles butter, as it naturally must, the maker is guilty of violating the provisions of the act of 1890; and if he colors it to avoid such resemblance he is guilty of violating the act of 1894. There is no other way to avoid the resemblance inhibited by the act of 1890, except by changing the appearance of the product with coloring matter, and this by the letter of the law he is forbidden to do.

1. The state may by appropriate legislation compel the maker or vendor of any article of food to properly label it by name and analysis, and sell it for what it really is.

2. It may ordinarily forbid the coating or polishing of such article with intent to make it appear something else than it really is, and thereby defraud.

3. It may not, however, dictate to any man what shall or shall not enter into the manufacture of any food that he may make and offer for sale, provided he uses only harmless ingredients therein, subject, perhaps, to the limitation that he must not intentionally defraud; e. g. a man has a perfect right to stamp the word "sterling" on a wagon or a law book, but he may be forbidden to engrave it on a silver plate, because it there implies a guarantee founded on the customs of trade.

Prior to the introduction of oleomargarine as an article of commerce, butter, except during certain portions of the year, was white. The makers of oleomargarine uniformly colored their product yellow, using as a rule a harmless, but expensive, vegetable coloring, annatto. Whatever the reason may be, people prefer that the substance they spread on their bread should be yellow. All creamery butter, and the vast majority of country butter, is artificially colored yellow, not in order to make the consumer believe that it is "summer dairy butter," but because the consumer desires his butter to be yellow, the same as he may desire his trousers black. It is no more tyrannical to compel clothing not all wool to be uniformly colored green, than to compel butter having a little less tributyrin than yellow dairy butter to be colored black or white.

Oleomargarine is an article of commerce—a food—made by churning together oleo oil (beef suet), neutral oil (leaf lard), and milk and cream in equal parts, with the addition of ordinary table salt, and with or without some harmless vegetable coloring matter. It is a necessary article of food, and enters into the diet of our people. It is equally as good and wholesome a food as butter. The vice in all reasoning which underlies the defense of the sumptuary laws against oleomargarine is found in the assumption that the product legislated against is an inferior article that no one would knowingly buy, and that it can only secure customers by pretending to be butter. If it is shown that oleomargarine is as good, healthful, and valuable as butter, we are able to lose the idea that one is a fraud upon the other, and realize that they are well-matched rivals struggling for commercial success. This view, once obtained, permits us to view the real purpose and aim of the sumptuary laws against oleomargarine.

Private property shall ever be held inviolate.

Spear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is an Ohio corporation, chartered June 27, 1893, and thereby granted the right, privilege, and franchise of manufacturing, selling, and dealing in oleomargarine, and the materials and utensils employed in the manufacture, storage, and transportation thereof, and all things incident thereto. Its principal place of business is the city of Columbus. The complaint is that the defendant has continuously since about the time of its creation offended against the laws of the state, misused its corporate authority, franchises, and privileges, and assumed franchises and privileges not granted to it, and has assumed and exercised rights, privileges, and franchises specially inhibited by law, in these particulars, to wit: (1) It has manufactured and sold an article in imitation and semblance of natural butter, which article was made of animal and vegetable oils and compounds with milk or cream, or both, which was not in separate and distinct form, and in such manner as would advise consumers of its real character, and was not free from coloring matter or other ingredients causing it to look like and appear to be butter, which said article was not butter, but was an article made in imitation and semblance thereof. (2) It has manufactured, and has offered and exposed for sale, and has sold and delivered, and held in its possession with intent to sell and deliver, in quantities from 10,000 to 20,000 pounds daily, oleomargarine, containing coloring matter, namely, annatto, and other coloring matter to relator unknown. (3) It has manufactured and sold a substance purporting and appearing to be butter, and having the semblance of butter, but which was not butter, but was oleomargarine; and the parcels and rolls thereof were not distinctly and durably stamped or painted or marked in the true name thereof, in ordinary, bold-face capital letters. (4) It has refused and still refuses to deliver and furnish to the duly appointed, qualified, and acting inspector and agent of the dairy and food commissioner of the state any sample or quantity of oleomargarine manufactured by it, although duly demanded by him, and the value of the same for a 10-pound package thereof, or any other reasonable quantity thereof, was tendered it for the analysis thereof, and has refused and still refuses to permit said inspector and agent to enter its factory for any purpose whatsoever, and has refused and still refuses to permit him to examine or cause to be examined any of the products manufactured by it. And, further, that all of said violations of law have been made and done by the defendant with full knowledge of the said violations, and for the expressed purpose and intent of violating and evading said laws, for the purpose of deceiving the people of this and other states as to the real character of its said product, contrary to the act of March 7, 1890, entitled "An Act to Prevent Deception in the Sale of Dairy Products and Preserve the Public Health." Evidence in support of these charges was introduced on the part of the state. No evidence was offered by defendant. Without going into detail, it is sufficient to say that the evidence compels the conclusion that the acts charged have been committed by defendant, and that their frequency, and the conduct of the officers of the department in relation thereto, warrant the further conclusion that the acts were committed wilfully, and with the intent to disregard the provisions of statute, and to defy the officers of the state whose specific duty it is to enforce the law in this behalf, so that the natural results of all such acts are presumed to have been intended. Objection is offered to the competency of testimony as to acts of the defendant since the commencement of this proceeding. But, inasmuch as the matter of final judgment depends somewhat upon the discretion of the court, we regard this evidence competent as bearing upon the animus, purpose, knowledge, and intent of the defendant, and as calculated to aid the court in the exercise of a proper discretion respecting the character of the judgment to be entered.

The defense offered is twofold. First, that the acts, a violation of which is charged, are unconstitutional, as being an arbitrary and unauthorized attempt to interfere with the natural right to conduct a legitimate business, which is beneficial to the public, as well as profitable to its promoters; and, second, that this proceeding cannot be maintained, because, if the laws referred to be valid, their violation is punishable in a criminal proceeding, and a definite, adequate, penal sentence may follow a conviction in such proceeding. And, besides, the right to manufacture and vend oleomargarine is not a franchise, and its abuse, should the same be shown, is not the abuse or misuse of a franchise, and not the proper subject of a quo warranto proceeding; hence relator has mistaken his remedy, and his petition should be dismissed.

The statutes claimed to have been violated are the act of March 7, 1890, entitled "An Act to Prevent Deception in the Sale of Dairy Products and to Preserve the Public Health," annotated in Bates's Statutes as §§ 4200-13, 14, by which it is provided that:

"Sec. 4200-13. No person by himself or his agent, or his employee, shall render or manufacture for sale out of any animal or vegetable oils, not produced from unadulterated milk or cream from the same, any article in imitation or semblance of natural butter or cheese, produced from pure unadulterated milk or cream from the same, nor compound with or add to milk, cream or butter, any acids or other deleterious substance, or animal fats, or animal or vegetable oils not produced from milk or cream, so as to produce any article or substance or any human food in imitation or semblance of natural butter or cheese, nor shall sell, keep for sale, or offer for sale, any article, substance, or compound made, manufactured, or produced in violation of the provisions of this section whether such article, substance, or compound shall be made or produced in this state or elsewhere.

"Sec. 4200-14. For the purpose of this act, the terms 'natural butter and cheese,' 'natural butter or cheese produced from pure unadulterated milk or cream from the same, butter and cheese, made from unadulterated milk or cream, butter or cheese, the product of the dairy,' and butter or cheese shall be understood to mean the products usually known by the terms 'butter and cheese' and which butter is manufactured exclusively from pure milk or cream or both, with salt and with or without any harmless coloring matter, and which cheese is manufactured exclusively from pure milk or cream or both, with salt and rennet and with or without any harmless coloring matter or sage. It is further provided that nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine in a separate and distinct form and in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character, free from any coloring matter, or other ingredient causing it to look like or to appear to be butter, as above defined."

Also, the act of May 16, 1894, having a like title (now § 4200-16), which reads: "No person shall manufacture, offer or expose for sale, sell or deliver, or have in his possession with intent to sell or deliver, any oleomargarine which contains any methyl [methyl] orange, butter yellow, annatto, aniline dye, or any other coloring matter." Also, the 1st section of the act of May 17, 1886, as amended March 21, 1887, entitled "An Act . . . to Prevent Adulteration and Deception in the Sale of Dairy Products" (now § 4200-30), which provides "that no person shall sell, expose, or offer for sale or exchange, any substance purporting, appearing, or represented to be butter or cheese, or having the semblance of either butter or cheese, which substance is not made wholly from pure milk or cream, salt, and harmless coloring matter, unless it is done under its true name, and each vessel, package, roll, or parcel of such substance has distinctly and durably painted, stamped, stenciled, or marked thereon, the true name of such substance in ordinary bold-faced capital letters not less than five-line pica in size and also the name of each article or ingredient used or entering into the composition of such substance in ordinary bold-faced letters not [less] than pica in size, or sell or dispose of in any manner to another, any such substance without delivering with each amount sold or disposed of, a label on which is plainly or legibly printed in ordinary bold-faced capital letters not less than five line pica in size, the true name of such substance, and also the name of such articles used and entering into the composition of such substance in ordinary bold-faced letters, not less than pica in size, if the same be not made wholly from pure milk or cream, salt and harmless coloring matter, and the words 'butter,' 'creamery' or 'dairy,' or any word or combination of words embracing the same shall not be placed on any vessel, package, roll, or parcel containing any imitation dairy product or substance not made wholly from pure milk or cream, salt, and harmless coloring matter." Also, § 4 of the act of March 20, 1884, entitled "An Act to Provide against the Adulteration of Food and Drugs" (now § 4200-7), which provides that "every person manufacturing, offering, or exposing for sale, or delivering to a purchaser any drug or article of food included in the provisions of this act, shall furnish to any person interested or demanding the same, who shall apply to him for the purpose, and shall tender him the value of the same, a sample sufficient for the analysis of any such drug or article of food which is in his possession."

It is not intended here to enter into a general dissertation respecting the origin or method of manufacture of oleomargarine, or its usefulness or healthfulness, when manufactured of pure and clean materials, and in a cleanly and wholesome manner. It is sufficient to say that it is not, within the meaning of these acts, butter, when made in any manner and of any ingredients; that in its natural state it is nearly white in color, while butter in its natural state is generally (although not always) yellow, but oleomargarine, when colored, can be made and is made to so nearly resemble butter as to be easily, and, when not distinctly marked, usually, mistaken for it, and that it may be and often is manufactured from such material and in such manner as to be deleterious to health. With this general statement, we proceed to consider serially the objections and defenses before stated.

1. The constitutionality of the several acts: What is their purpose and scope? At the outset it should be understood that the statutes do not undertake to prohibit the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine. On the other hand, their expressed purpose, gathered from text and title as well, is to regulate its manufacture and sale. In substance, they provide that no one shall manufacture for sale any article in imitation of butter, or any compound or substance or any human food in imitation or semblance of natural butter, which is not pure butter; that no one shall manufacture or offer or expose to sale any oleomargarine which contains any coloring matter; that no one shall sell any substance purporting, appearing, or represented to be butter, or having a semblance of butter, unless it be under its true name, and with proper mark designating such name; and that all persons dealing in food shall, upon proper application and tender of price, furnish a sample suitable for analysis. Construed with that part of § 2 of the act of March 7, 1890, which provides that oleomargarine may be manufactured "in a separate and distinct form, and in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character, free from any coloring matter or other ingredient, causing it to look like, or to appear to be butter," it becomes entirely manifest that this legislation is regulation, not prohibition, so that we may leave out of consideration that portion of the argument which seeks to establish on the one hand, and deny on the other, a right in the state to directly prohibit its sale, or legislate so as to reach that result by indirection. The question, therefore, is, Do the sections of the statute quoted, or any of them, violate our bill of rights, which guarantees the right of acquiring and protecting property, or do they in any way violate the Constitution, as being subversive of the constitutional right to liberty, and the enjoyment of property? In other words, is it within the legislative competency to establish regulations for the prevention of fraud and deceit in the sale of articles of food? We are of opinion that the question is not an open one in Ohio. This court has held again and again that the police power of the state is properly exercised in the protection of the people in all matters concerning their health, and that it is within the scope of this power to regulate the manufacture and sale of articles of food, even though the right to so manufacture and sell is a natural right guaranteed by the Constitution. Conceding that where the pursuit rests upon natural right, and the product is not harmful, this power may not be exercised in a way which will result practically in inhibition, though under the guise of regulation, and in fostering the interests of a rival product, yet where the manufacture is conducted in such way as is calculated to deceive,—lead the buyer to suppose he is purchasing an article of food which is everywhere recognized as wholesome,—and especially where the article sought to be regulated may easily be manufactured so as to be harmful, and thus result in fraud upon and injury to the public, the police power is properly exercised in the regulation of the manufacture and sale of such article by such requirements as will tend to insure the public against fraud and injury. Its proper disposition is not forbidden. As stated in Jordan v. Dayton, 4 Ohio, 295, the owner has "power to manage his property or give direction to his labors at his pleasure, subject only to the paramount claims of society, which requires that his enjoyment may be modified by the exigencies of the community to which he belongs, and regulated by laws which render it subservient to the general welfare." These several statutes, framed to accomplish this end, entail no particular hardship, are reasonable in their requirements, and do not contravene any section of the Constitution. Nor is there any question whatever in regard to the power of the state to compel a sample for analysis of any article of food. It would be a waste of space to argue the matter. We hold that in that particular, also, the statute is reasonable and just. Jordan v. Dayton, 4 Ohio, 295; State v. Ruedy, 57 Ohio St. 224, 48 N. E. 944. Other authorities covering the question are abundant, but it is not necessary to refer to them here. They will be found cited in the briefs of counsel. However, we call attention to a recent utterance of the Supreme Court of the United States in Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183, 44 L. ed. 725, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633, which involved the right of the city to forbid the sale of cigarettes without a license (opinion by Mr. Justice Peckham): "Regulations respecting the pursuit of a lawful trade or business are of very frequent occurrence in the various cities of the country, and what such regulations shall be, and to what particular trade, business, or occupation they shall apply, are questions for the state to determine, and their determination comes within the proper exercise of the police power by the state; and unless the regulations are so utterly unreasonable and extravagant in their nature and purpose that the property and personal rights of the citizen are unnecessarily, and in a manner wholly arbitrary, interfered with or destroyed without due process of law, they do not extend beyond the power of the state to pass, and they form no subject for Federal interference. . . . It is not a valid objection to the ordinance that it partakes of both the character of a regulation, and also that of an excise or privilege tax. . . . So long as the state law authorizes both regulation and taxation, it is enough, and the enforcement of the ordinance violates no provision of the Federal Constitution."

2. The remedy by criminal prosecution: It is enough to say of this objection that the remedy is not adequate. The object of the statute is to protect the public. In the nature of things, a small fine is not a sufficient deterrent to accomplish the desired end, especially in the case of a company possessed of ample means and conducting a large business. The difference between the price at which butter may be manufactured and sold, and that at which oleomargarine may be afforded, is so large that the temptation to impose upon the public is too great to be resisted. In addition to this, there are practical difficulties in obtaining convictions, which the experience of the dairy and food commissioner, as shown by his report (a public document), fully attests. King v. Severn & W. R. Co. 2 Barn. & Ald. 646; People v. State Auditors, 42 Mich. 422, 4 N. W. 274.

3. The right to manufacture and sell oleomargarine is not a franchise, and hence the proceeding of quo warranto not a proper remedy: It would seem a sufficient answer to this proposition to say that, if it be true, then the defendant has no franchise whatever. Its charter (the certificate of the secretary of state) gives it "the right, privilege, and franchise of manufacturing, selling, and dealing in oleomargarine," etc. This authority carries the implication that the business must be conducted in conformity to the laws of the state. It could not have been the intent of the general assembly, in enacting laws permitting the formation of corporations, to give them power to override the state, although the conduct of the officers of the defendant would seem to imply that they have entertained a different opinion. The time has not yet arrived when the created is greater than the creator, and it still remains the duty of the courts to perform their office in the enforcement of the laws, no matter how ingenious the pretexts for their violation may be, nor the power of the violators in the commercial world.

In order to avoid misunderstanding, it may be well to here repeat what substantially appears elsewhere,—that there is no inhibition, under the laws of Ohio, of the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine. The requisite simply is that it shall purport to be what it really is, and shall not be so manufactured and put up as to deceive the consumer. Bates's Anno. Stat. §§ 4200-14, distinctly provides "that nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine, in a separate and distinct form, and in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character. . . ."

In the present case the acts of the defendant have been persistent, defiant, and flagrant, and no other course is left to the court than to enter a judgment of ouster, and to appoint trustees to wind up the business of the concern. Judgment accordingly.

Affirmed by Supreme Court of United States January 6, 1902.

McWhorter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Consolidated Light & Railway Company on the 3d of October, 1899, being the owner and operating an electric street railway upon Third avenue, in the city of Huntington, on that day by one of its cars ran down and killed a child named Charles Jennings Lyons, two years and three months of age. On the 7th of October, 1899, E. E. Sample was appointed administrator of said child, and brought his action of trespass on the case against said company for the death of the child, laying his damages at $10,000. Defendant demurred to the declaration, which demurrer was overruled, and the plea of the general issue entered, and a jury impaneled. Upon the trial of the case the jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $4,000. The defendant, by counsel, moved the court to set aside said verdict, and grant it a new trial, upon the ground that said verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence, and because the same is excessive, evincing on the part of the jury prejudice, passion, partiality, and bias, which motion was overruled, and judgment entered upon said verdict. In the course of the trial the defendant tendered five bills of exceptions, which were signed, and saved to it, and made part of the record. The defendant obtained a writ of error assigning seven causes of error: First, in overruling the demurrer to plaintiff's declaration; second, that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence; third, that the verdict was excessive, and the court erred in not setting it aside; fourth, in modifying the defendant's instruction set out in first bill of exceptions; fifth, sixth, and seventh assignments relate to the admission of what is claimed to be improper testimony. Plaintiff in error assigns no cause of demurrer, and makes no mention of it in the brief of counsel for it, and the declaration seems to be sufficient.

It is claimed by plaintiff in error that the verdict of the jury is so excessive as to evince passion, bias, and prejudice, and therefore should be set aside. "Four thousand dollars was given by the jury for a male child of only two years and four months of age. Limit of $10,000 in the eye of the law compensates for the most valuable life of mature manhood or womanhood, and certainly nearly one half of that sum is excessive for a mere babe, yet to be reared and conducted through the vicissitudes of childhood, and educated and maintained." Counsel seems to take a purely commercial view of the matter. The law does not fix a commercial value either on children or adults. A calamity of this nature cannot be compensated for in dollars and cents. The highest privilege that is given one in this life is to "rear and conduct through the vicissitudes of childhood and educate and maintain" one's children. No greater source of happiness pertains to this life. Section 6, chap. 103, Code, relating to actions of this character, provides: "In every such action the jury may give such damages as they shall deem fair and just, not exceeding ten thousand dollars." This statute puts no value upon any individual, young or old, but the matter is left wholly with the jury as to what shall be deemed a fair and just amount of damages to be ascertained, not to exceed the amount authorized by statute. There are many cases where verdicts similar to this have been sustained by the courts. In Houghkirk v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 28 Hun, 407, the court refused to set aside as excessive a verdict for $5,000, rendered for the death of a child six years of age. The court in that case in its opinion says that "the damages could be reviewed in this court. But the difficulty is, By what test are we to review them? If it is a matter of guesswork, the jury can guess as well as we. If we are to review them by the test of the evidence, then the difficulty is that there is no direct evidence proving the amount of loss." The statute has wisely left it with the jury to say what the damages shall be. In Turner v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 40 W. Va. 875, 22 S. E. 83 (syl., point 5), it is held: "The action of the jury assessing damages in case of the death of a person by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of another is not reviewable, as no damages allowed by the jury within the limit fixed by the statute can be deemed excessive; their determination of this question being absolute and exclusive as to what damages are fair and just, unless the verdict evinces passion, prejudice, partiality, or corruption on the part of the jury." There is nothing in the record in case at bar to indicate in any way that the action of the jury was not fair and impartial, and void of all passion, prejudice, or corruption.

The fourth assignment is the improper modification by the court, as set out in bill of exception No. 3, of the defendant's instruction, as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they find from the facts and circumstances of this case that Charles J. Lyons, the father of the child that was killed by the defendant's car on the 3d day of October, 1899, negligently permitted said child to escape into the street, where it was run over and killed, and such negligence was the proximate cause of its death, then the negligence of the father must be attributed to the child, and the verdict should be for the defendant." Upon plaintiff's objection to said instruction the court added the following words: "Unless the jury further find that the motorman, Chas. Wade, was not exercising any care in looking out for persons upon or near the defendant's track; and that, if the said motorman had been in the exercise of such care, he could have discovered the child, and stopped the car in time to prevent the accident." Plaintiff in error insists that the modification should have carried the idea of wilful or wanton negligence on the part of defendant. The modification is sufficient, it seems to me, to carry with it the idea of criminal negligence if the jury can believe that the motorman was not exercising any care in looking out for persons upon and near the defendant's track. The expression contained in the modification is not "the use of ordinary care" or "reasonable care," but if he was not exercising any care. "A motorman in charge of an electric car moving in the public street, where he has reason to expect little children are playing, must exercise a high degree of watchfulness in the operation of his car." Black, Law & Pr. in Acci. Cases, p. 58, § 52; Bergen County Traction Co. v. Heitman, 61 N. J. L. 682, 40 Atl. 651, —where it is held: "That a child two years and three months old,—to whom contributory negligence cannot be imputed,—was suffered to roam unattended in the public street, cannot relieve a traction company from liability for its negligence in the management of its car, resulting in the child's death." San Antonio Street R. Co. v. Mechler, 87 Tex. 628, 30 S. W. 899. The question properly arises in this case, Was the defendant entitled, in any event, to an instruction on the question of contributory negligence on the part of the father? There is absolutely no evidence of contributory negligence unless the naked fact of the child being on the street alone could raise the presumption of negligence. On the other hand, all the evidence on that point tends to prove rather unusual care on the part of the parents, especially of the father. The child had been found unlatching the gate prior to this time. The parents had watched it, and, finding its mode of procedure to get out, the father had some month or two before the accident made special provisions for fastening the gate in a way that the child could not open it. In Thompson's new work on the Law of Negligence (vol. 1, § 324) it is said: "Small children have a right to light, air, and exercise, and the children of the poor cannot be constantly watched by their parents. From these considerations it follows that the mere fact that a child of tender years has been injured while at large and unattended on a public street or highway does not necessarily impute contributory negligence to its parents or guardian as matter of law, but is at most only prima facie evidence of negligence on their part subject to explanation. The question whether they have been negligent in allowing the child to be at large is generally a question for the jury in view of the circumstances attending the particular case. Even in the case of a very young child,—in one case only two years of age,—if, notwithstanding the exercise of reasonable care on their part, having regard to the situation, the child escapes upon the public street, and is therein injured through the negligence of another, that other must pay for the damages." Farris v. Cass Avenue & F. G. R. Co. 80 Mo. 325. And section 325 of the same work cites numerous cases of the same character. And in Gavin v. Chicago, 97 Ill. 66, 37 Am. Rep. 99, where a child four years of age left its parents' house unattended, without their knowledge or consent, the father was absent, engaged in manual labor, and its mother was confined to her room by sickness. While thus absent, it received a personal injury. It appeared that as soon as the mother discovered its absence she made search for it. It also appeared that the family were dependent upon their daily labor for support. It was held that a verdict exonerating the parents of the child from negligence ought not to be disturbed. In Chicago v. Heising, 83 Ill. 204, 25 Am. Rep. 378, it is held: "The giving of an instruction slightly inaccurate, but which, under the facts of the case, could not have worked to the prejudice of the party complaining, or have misled the jury, will not justify the reversal of the judgment." We are unable to see under the circumstances of this case how the instruction in the form asked by defendant could possibly have changed the result. The child was too young to have any care for its safety, and its parents omitted no reasonable care for its protection. If the jury had found or conceived from the evidence any contributory negligence on the part of the father or parents under the instruction as offered by the defendant, the jury must have further found under the modification made by the court of said instruction that the motorman was exercising absolutely no care in looking out for persons upon or near the defendant's track, and they must have further found that, if he had been exercising ordinary care in that behalf, he could have discovered the child, and stopped the car in time to have prevented the accident.

The motorman's own testimony shows that the "child was about midway from the curbstone and the track," and "about 30 or 35 feet from the car," and "running towards the track at kind of angle with the way that the car was coming," when he first saw the child. Another witness for the defendant (Clyde Tanner) testifies that he was about 30 feet behind the car, on his bicycle, going the same way, and at about the same speed the car was going, and he saw the child step off the curbstone into the street, and run towards the track until it was run down by the car, while others evidently saw it before the motorman claims to have seen it; and he is the only witness who was examined whose duty it was to keep an outlook, and see the movements of the child from the very moment it started towards the track. There is a good deal of conflict of testimony in regard to the relative positions of some of the parties that came onto the ground just at the time of the accident, which conflict of testimony was proper for the consideration of the jury. According to the testimony of the motorman, and admitting that he did everything that he could, from the time that he first saw the child, to stop the car, he did nothing until the child had run half the distance from the curbstone to the street-car track, when it was clearly his duty to have seen it when it left the curbstone, and to have begun at once to guard against the accident.

The defendant offered the following instruction: "The court also instructs the jury that in considering this case they must wholly disregard the evidence of Mrs. Caverlee so far as the same relates to the following statement which she attributed to Motorman Wade, 'I saw the child, but thought I could pass it.' Also wholly disregard the evidence of witness E. McClain as it relates to statement attributed by him to Motorman Wade, to wit: 'This is a terrible thing. I saw the child, but thought I could run past it,'"—set out in bill of exceptions No. 2. The defendant also filed bills of exceptions to the rulings of the court in permitting the plaintiff to ask the witnesses Mrs. Caverlee and E. McClain the questions eliciting the answers set out in the instruction to be asked and answered. The question is, Can the statement attributed to the motorman at the time and under the circumstances of the accident be treated as a part of the res gestæ? It is contended by plaintiff in error that it is not bound by the expressions of the motorman as stated by the witnesses, even if true; that the statements were simply the narrative of the past event, and not concurrent with the fact involved, and therefore could not be treated as part of the res gestæ, and could not have been admitted on any other ground. In 2 Jones, Ev. § 347, it is stated: "When declarations or acts accompany the fact in controversy, and tend to illustrate or explain it, they are treated, not as hearsay, but as original, evidence; in other words, as part of the res gestæ. Thus, conversations contemporaneous with the facts in controversy, and explaining such facts, are admissible." And authorities there cited. The rule is laid down in 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 99, as follows: "The rule is that evidence of words or acts may be admissible (notwithstanding the general rule against derivative evidence) on the ground that they form part of the res gestæ, provided that the act which they accompany is itself admissible in evidence, and that they reflect light on or qualify that act. But they must be so connected with the main fact under consideration as to illustrate its character, to further its object, or to form in conjunction with it one continuous transaction. If declarations are made some time before the act, and stand alone by themselves, they are not within the rule, and are inadmissible. If they amount to no more than a mere narrative of the past occurrence, or of an isolated conversation held or an isolated act done at a later period, they are not admissible; but, if declarations of a past occurrence are made under such circumstances as will raise the reasonable presumption that they are the spontaneous utterances of thoughts created by or springing out of the transaction itself, and so soon thereafter as to exclude the presumption that they are the result of premeditation and design, they will be admissible as part of the res gestæ." 1 Wharton, Ev. § 259, states the rule substantially the same way. 1 Greenl. Ev. 162g, says: "The willingness to receive these statements as an exception to the hearsay rule rests on the notion that the circumstances of the occasion so excite and control the mind of the speaker that his statements are natural and spontaneous, and therefore sincere and trustworthy;" and quotes United States v. King, 34 Fed. 314, where the court charged the jury that "the declarations of an individual made at the moment of a particular occurrence, when the circumstances are such that we may assume that his mind is controlled by the event, may be received in evidence, because they are supposed to be expressions involuntarily forced out of him by the particular event, and thus have an element of truthfulness they might otherwise not have." And in 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 914, it is said that, "while it is essential that the declaration should be contemporaneous with, or at least so connected with, the main fact in issue as to constitute a part of the transaction, and thus derive credit from the main fact or act itself, . . . still it is not necessary that a declaration, to be part of the res gestæ, should be precisely and astronomically contemporaneous and concurrent in point of time with the principal transaction, but rather that it be made voluntarily, unpremeditatedly, spontaneously, and under the immediate and unconscious influence of the principal transaction, and be made at such a time, whether contemporaneous and concurrent or not, and also under such circumstances and conditions, as to exclude the idea of deliberate intent and design." Underhill, Ev. § 57, says: "Though the majority of the American decisions, however, do not require that the act and the declarations should be precisely contemporaneous, provided they are otherwise connected, in many of the states the strict English doctrine is adhered to. Their unpremeditated and spontaneous character being the main ground for their reception, it is clear, on the whole, that, where any interval has elapsed between the act and the declaration, the likelihood that the declarant has taken advice, or considered what he should say, 57 L. R. A.

would have a bearing on their exclusion. . . . But where the declaration was made soon after the event with which it was connected, it is admissible, provided a period, however short, has not elapsed which would give an opportunity for deliberation." In Springfield Consol. R. Co. v. Welsch, 155 Ill. 511, 40 N. E. 1034, it is held: "A declaration by the motorman running an electric car, made while the car was still on the body of one it had run down, that the reason he did not stop was that he could not reverse the car, is admissible in evidence as part of the res gestæ in a suit for the injury." Quincy Horse R. & Carrying Co. v. Lyons, 129 Pa. 113, 18 Atl. 759; Livingstone's Case, 14 Gratt. 592; Kirby's Case, 77 Va. 681, 46 Am. Rep. 747. Plaintiff in error relies upon Corder v. Talbott, 14 W. Va. 277 (syl. point 3), where it is held: "When the declarations are merely a narrative of a past occurrence, though made ever so soon after the occurrence, they ought not to be received in evidence, they being in such case no part of the res gestæ." In that case Judge Green shows that the declaration there sought to be given in evidence was a declaration of the party in his own favor, and, as the judge says: "In the case before us we have seen there is no difficulty in saying that the fact, in connection with which the defendant's declarations were proposed to be admitted, was in no manner connected with the material fact at issue in the case; that is, whether the defendant had signed the bond. The defendant's declaration that he would not sign it is in no manner connected with the material fact at issue. It is a circumstance, as we have seen, in itself so unconnected, that it would not have been given in evidence as direct evidence on the trial of this issue; and it was only admissible as a collateral fact to contradict one of the plaintiff's witnesses. And therefore, they, being declarations of a party in his own favor, though a part of the res gestæ, of a collateral fact introduced into the case merely to contradict a witness of the other side, but in no way otherwise connected with the material fact or inquiry involved in the issue, were not admissible." And further he says: "These cases are readily distinguishable from the ordinary case of a prisoner declaring immediately after the killing of a man how he committed the act. In such case a material part of the inquiry is, What were the prisoner's motives or feelings? And his declarations immediately afterwards tend to show these feelings, and for this reason they are admitted. They are, in such case, not a mere recital of a past occurrence. The act here was the refusal by the defendant to sign this bond. Such an act, in its very nature, cannot be illustrated, explained, or characterized by any declarations of the defendant." The case of Luby v. Hudson River R. Co. 17 N. Y. 131, is cited by plaintiff in error, and he quotes from the language of the court: "It [declaration] was not made at the time of the act, so as to give it quality and character. The alleged wrong was complete, and the driver, when he made the statement, was only endeavoring to account for what he had done." But he fails to quote the next sentence, which is, "He was manifestly excusing himself, and throwing the blame on his principals;" thus clearly showing that the court excluded it because the driver had had time to fix up a story to clear himself of blame and cast it upon his principals. It was not a declaration made, as in case at bar, which is clearly brought within the rule as laid down in the authorities cited as being a "spontaneous utterance of thoughts created by or springing out of the transaction itself, and so soon thereafter as to exclude the presumption that they are the result of premeditation and design." The very nature of the declaration alleged to have been made by the motorman in the case at bar shows, if made, that it was true, because it was against himself, and, if uttered at all, must have been without thought or premeditation, and it was so soon after the accident (if it can be said at all to be after the accident) that he had not time to think what would be the effect of his expression. It was uttered while the thought was still fresh in his mind. "He thought he could run past it," but now finds that he was mistaken.

Plaintiff in error also cites Hawker v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 15 W. Va. 628, 36 Am. Rep. 825, to show the approval by Judge Green of the said case of Luby v. Hudson River R. Co., cited. We find in the same case, on page 638, 15 W. Va., 36 Am. Rep. 825, where Judge Green cites with approval the case of Hanover R. Co. v. Coyle, 35 Pa. 402, where a peddler's cart had been overthrown by a railroad car, and a suit instituted by him for the injury. The plaintiff was permitted by the court below to prove the declaration of the engineer at the time of the accident for the purpose of showing the train was behind time, and thus show carelessness and negligence as a part of the res gestæ. Judge Green says: "The supreme court say: 'The record shows no bill of exceptions to this evidence; but, if it did, we cannot say that the declaration of the engineer was no part of the res gestæ. It was made at the time of the accident, in view of the goods strewn along the road by the breaking up of the boxes, and it seems to have grown directly out of and immediately after the happening of the fact. The negligence complained of being that of the engineer himself, we cannot say that his declaration, made upon the spot, at the time, and in view of the effects of his conduct, are not evidence against the company as a part of the transaction itself.'" This was a case in which the declarations of the engineer were made after the accident was complete, "in view of the goods strewn along the road by the breaking up of the boxes, and it seems to have grown directly out of and immediately after the happening of the fact," and, as it was against the engineer himself, showing his own negligence, the court admitted it in evidence against the company as a part of the transaction itself. It would be hard to conceive of a case more perfectly illustrating the facts and circumstances of the case at bar. The declarations of the motorman, if made, were made immediately after the happening of the accident, and while the child was yet under the car, mangled and crushed to death; the motorman, up to that time, not having sufficiently recovered himself to fabricate a story which would exonerate him from blame, and under the first impulse, feeling that the facts were patent to everyone, only stated what is almost certainly the truth, and which is the most plausible explanation of the transaction that could have been made. If he had seen that child starting from the curbstone to run towards the track as soon as others saw it, and as it was his duty to see it, he would undoubtedly have at once applied the forces for stopping the car, and must have succeeded before striking the child, because he admits in his testimony that it was half way from the curb to the track when he discovered it and began to stop the car, and even at that late time he was within a few feet of stopping it before the collision occurred. Plaintiff in error cites two Massachusetts cases,—Lane v. Bryant, 9 Gray, 245, 69 Am. Dec. 282, and Williamson v. Cambridge R. Co. 144 Mass. 148, 10 N. E. 790,—which come more nearly supporting his contention than any other cases he cites, but the great preponderance of authorities is against him. He referred to the case of Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 119 U. S. 99, 30 L. ed. 299, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 118, and quotes very largely from the opinion in that case written by Justice Harlan. It is there held: "The declaration of the engineer of the locomotive of a train, which meets with an accident, as to the speed at which the train was running when the accident happened, made between ten and thirty minutes after the accident occurred, is not admissible in evidence against the company in an action by a passenger on the train to recover damages for injuries caused by the accident." It will be observed that these declarations excluded were made some time—from ten to thirty minutes—after the accident occurred, and even in that case Justice Field wrote a dissenting opinion, in which Chief Justice Waite, Justice Miller, and Justice Blatchford concurred, in which dissenting opinion they refer with approval to the case of Hanover R. Co. v. Coyle, 55 Pa. 402. This opinion was rendered in 1880. In 1897 Justice Harlan wrote the opinion in the case of Peirce v. Van Dusen, 24 C. C. A. 280, 47 U. S. App. 339, 78 Fed. 693, in which it is held: "Where a railroad employee has been injured by the movement of cars about which he was at work, statements of the conductor of the train, made almost immediately, and while the cars were moving, or had just stopped, and while the injured man was bleeding from the injury at that moment received, describing his own part in bringing about the motion that effected the injury, are admissible, on the trial of an action for such injury, as part of the res gestæ."

It is seen there can be no fixed inflexible rule as to what declarations and assertions are a part of the res gestæ in every transaction, but the facts and circumstances must to a large extent control in each individual case. While the evidence to prove or tending to prove the declarations of the motorman as part of the res gestæ was clearly admissible under the circumstances of this case, the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict without it. The motorman saw the child, and vainly thought he could run past the point where the child would reach the track before it reached it, or he failed to see it in time to save it. If he had seen it from the moment it left the curbstone as it was seen by witness Clyde Tanner, who was riding on his bicycle behind the car, as was his duty to see it, he would have had good time to have stopped the car, and would have done so; but the child had run half the distance, according to the motorman's own testimony, before he saw it, and the fact that he at that late time only lacked a few feet of having the car stopped in time to have prevented the collision makes it clear that if he had seen it when he should have seen it—i. e., when it started from the curbstone—he would have had ample time to have stopped the car before the accident. One of a motorman's highest duties is to keep a proper lookout for persons, and especially for children, on and about the track. Gunn v. Ohio River R. Co. 42 W. Va. 676, 680, 681, 36 L. R. A. 575, 26 S. E. 546, of which case, syl., point 3, is as follows: "The engineer and fireman of a railroad train must keep a careful lookout on the track ahead to discover persons and animals upon it, and use ordinary care to avoid injury to them." This applies to railroad moving trains through the country. The required care is certainly no less in moving an electric car on the streets of a populous city, when children may be expected to be playing on the streets. Norfolk & P. R. Co. v. Ormsby, 27 Gratt. 455: "A railroad company running its cars through a populous street of a city on which many children live must omit nothing which can be done by the company and its agents to prevent injury to children on the street." And it is there further held (syl., point 3) that "a child two years and ten months old cannot be capable of contributory negligence, so as to relieve a railroad company from liability for its own negligence." In Felton v. Newport, 44 C. C. A. 530, 105 Fed. 332 (syl., point 3), it is held: "The mere fact that a lookout was maintained on an engine, as required by statute, and that he did not see a person on the track, does not exonerate the railroad company from liability for the killing of such person, but it must further appear that the lookout could not have seen him in the exercise of due care and watchfulness." The question in case at bar is, How is it possible for the motorman not to have seen the child until it was halfway across the street towards the track? and yet he says he did not sooner see it.

I see no error in the judgment, and the same is affirmed.

The measure of damages for breach of warranty of the capacity of a kiln for drying lumber is not, when there is no kiln of the agreed capacity on the market, the difference between the value of the kiln sold and one of the required capacity, but is the difference between the value of the apparatus delivered and the contract price.

I. Scope and purpose.

The general rule with reference to the measure of damages for breach of contract of sale, supported by a great number of cases, whether the breach was by the vendor or by the vendee, is that the injured party is entitled to recover the difference between the contract price of the article sold and the market value thereof at the time and place of delivery. This rule is based upon the theory that, if the breach was by the vendor, the vendee could go into the market and procure the goods to which he was entitled under the contract, suffering only to the extent that the market value exceeded the contract price, and if the breach was by the vendee, the vendor could go into the market and dispose of the goods the vendee had refused to take from him, so that he would be in the same position as though the goods had been received, except as to the difference between what he would have received under the contract and what he got in the market. See note, Loss of profits of sale or purchase as damages, to Guetzkow Bros. Co. v. A. H. Andrews & Co. (Wis.) 52 L. R. A. 209. This rule depends in all cases, however, on market value, and it is the intent and purpose of this note APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Craven County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of a dry kiln. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

to show the rule applicable in cases of the same class in which there was no market value of the thing sold to compare with the contract price, and to show the changes and modifications in the general rule made necessary by such absence of market value.

II. Breach by vendor.

a. General rules as to recovery.

The rule applicable to sales of personal property, that where the article is one that can be bought in the market the proper measure of damages for breach of a contract to deliver is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place of the breach, does not generally apply where the vendee cannot obtain the article purchased in the market. Loescher v. Delsterberg, 26 Ill. App. 521; Bell v. Reynolds, 78 Ala. 511, 56 Am. Rep. 52; McKay v. Riley, 65 Cal. 623, 4 Pac. 667; Benton v. Fay, 64 Ill. 417; Den Bleyker v. Gaston, 97 Mich. 354, 56 N. W. 763; Cobb v. Whitsett, 51 Mo. App. 146; McHose v. Fulmer, 73 Pa. 385; Davis v. Grand Rapids School-Furniture Co. 41 W. Va. 717, 24 S. E. 630; Cockburn v. Ashland Lumber Co. 34 Wis. 619, 12 N. W. 49; Halstead Lumber Co. v. Sutton, 46 Kan. 192, 26 Pac. 444; Carroll-Porter Boiler & Tank Co. v. Columbus Mach. Co. 5 C. C. A. 190, 3 U. S. App. 631, 55 Fed. 451; Elbinger Actien-Gesellschaft v. Armstrong, L. R. 9 Q. B. 473, 23 Week. Rep. 127, 43 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 211, 30 L. T. N. S. 871; Trigg v. Clay, 88 Va. 330, 13 S. E. 434.

That rule only applies when the article sold can be procured in the market, and has a market price. Sternfels v. Clark, 2 Hun. 122, Affirmed in 70 N. Y. 608.

And a statute providing that, for the purpose of estimating damages, the value of an instrument in writing or other property is deemed to be the price at which an equivalent thing could within a reasonable time thereafter be bought in the nearest market, is inapplicable as a means of estimating the value of property which in itself, or through an equivalent, has no market value. Patterson v. Plummer, 10 N. D. 95, 86 N. W. 111.

Nor can the ordinary rule that the sum recoverable for a breach of warranty of an article sold is the difference between the price contracted to be paid for the article as warranted and the market price of like articles at the time of the breach, be resorted to where the article is one which cannot be bought in the market. Carroll-Porter Boiler & Tank Co. v. Columbus Mach. Co. 5 C. C. A. 190, 3 U. S. App. 631, 55 Fed. 451.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action began January 20, 1890, to recover possession of a "dry kiln hot blast apparatus," which plaintiff sold to defendant for the price of $2,337, title retained till purchase money paid, and on which only $400 has been paid. The case has been pending ever since, and four opinions herein have been heretofore written in this court. In the meantime the defendant has gone on using the machine, and the evidence in the last trial below is that the machinery is now only a lot of scrap iron worth $100. That and the bill of costs (which doubtless is much more than $100) and the replevin bond alone remain. The original defendant is dead, and is now represented by his administrator. It is necessary to review the former decisions herein. In (1892) 111 N. C. 87, 15 S. E. 939, in plaintiff's appeal, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover possession and damages for use and deterioration during detention by defendant, and that it was error to exclude evidence to show such damages. That was the only error declared, as in the defendant's appeal (111 N. C. 92, 93, 15 S. E. 940) it was held that there was no error in excluding defendant's counterclaim for cost of house he had built to shelter the machinery. This issue of damages for deterioration has been found in both trials since, and the deterioration assessed at $1,400, which, as the value of the property when bought is assessed at $1,500, bears out the above evidence of the "remains" being worth $100. It has now become a useless issue, as delivery in specie is no longer possible. When the case was here again—

But if there is no market for an article sold where it is to be delivered, and it cannot be had there with the use of reasonable diligence, and the purchaser suffers damage because of the seller's failure to deliver, which is the proximate and natural consequence of such failure, such damage can be recovered. Ramsey v. Tully, 12 Ill. App. 463; Parsons v. Sutton, 66 N. Y. 92; Halstead Lumber Co. v. Sutton, 46 Kan. 102, 26 Pac. 444.

And in such case the recovery should be the actual loss sustained by the purchaser in not receiving the goods according to the contract. Vickery v. McCormick, 117 Ind. 594, 20 N. E. 495; Dunkirk Hall Colliery Co. v. Lever, L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 20, 41 L. T. N. S. 633, 39 L. T. N. S. 239, 26 Week. Rep. 841, Affirmed in 43 L. T. N. S. 706.

A market value, as signifying a price established by public sales, or sales in the way of ordinary business, as of merchandise, is not necessary to the assessment of damages or the appraisal of property that is the subject of a judicial valuation. Property is often the subject of such valuation, for which no proof of value in the market can be given, because it is not brought into the course of trade, and is not known in the market; and in such cases the real value is to be ascertained from such elements of value as are attainable. Murray v. Stanton, 99 Mass. 345.

Thus, breach of a contract of sale of lumber for the construction of an elevator, by reason of which the purchaser, being unable to procure other lumber, was compelled to keep his workmen idle because of having no lumber to work on, and was delayed in the construction of the building, or put to additional expense by reason of the nondelivery thereof, warrants a recovery that would compensate him for the loss so sustained. Clark v. Koerner, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1668, 61 S. W. 30.

So, where one party purchased a quantity of chairs of another, and the latter refused to fill the contract, and the chairs were patented and could not be bought in the open market, and had been selected for their strength as well as style, and the party afterward succeeded in purchasing other chairs which were not so strong as those first purchased, and afterwards proved to be worth not more than half as much as those first contracted for, the purchaser is entitled to recover of the vendor the damages caused by the breach. Davis v. Grand Rapids School-Furniture Co. 41 W. Va. 717, 24 S. E. 630.

The above rule of recovery is especially applicable when the purchase was made for a special purpose, which purpose was known to the vendor.

Thus, failure of a vendor to deliver a quantity of lumber for joists of extraordinary length, according to the contract, warrants a recovery of special damages, where the vendor knew when he entered into the contract that that character of lumber was not obtainable at the place of delivery, and that it required to be specially prepared, and that such preparing could only be done at a place far away from the place of delivery. Shouse v. Nelswaanger, 18 Mo. App. 236.

And one who gave to another a license to cut lumber on his lands, and agreed to furnish the latter, at a reasonable market price, all the provisions and logging supplies needed by him during the continuance of the contract, and afterwards refused to furnish such supplies, is liable if when he entered into the contract he knew that the other party would be unable to obtain such supply elsewhere, and that he could not carry on the undertaking without them, and knew when he ceased furnishing the same that the result would be to compel the other to abandon the enterprise, or to seriously embarrass him in the further execution thereof, in damages for such abandonment or embarrassment, as they must be deemed to have been contemplated as the direct and presumable result of his wrongful act. Skagit R. & Lumber Co. v. Cole, 2 Wash. 57, 25 Pac. 1077.

So, where one party agrees to furnish another with certain stock and materials to be used in his business in time for an approaching state fair, with direct reference to the increased trade and business expected on that occasion, and fails to comply with the contract, and the other party is unable to supply himself at the place of delivery, which inability is known to the vendor, and the purchaser suffers loss in consequence, he is entitled to such damage as he can prove with reasonable certainty to have been the direct and natural result of the failure of the vendor to comply with his contract. Richardson v. Chynoweth, 26 Wis. 636.

And where a quantity of sewer brick was purchased for the purpose of building a sewer, the purpose being known to the vendor, and common brick would not answer, it is competent for the purchaser to prove, in an action for breach of the contract of sale, that upon the failure of the vendor to deliver the brick as agreed he endeavored to procure other sewer brick, but could find none in the market, and that, in consequence of the failure of the ven-

(1899) 124 N. C. 322, 32 S. E. 718—the jury found that the difference between the value of the machine sent and what it would have been worth if it had come up to contract was $2,000. As $400 had been paid on the $2,337 purchase price, leaving $1,937 unpaid, the judge gave judgment for $63 in favor of defendant, who retained the machinery, which he had used for years. This was putting the worth of the machinery when bought at $337, though on another issue the jury found it had depreciated in value $1,400 since bought; the evidence for the defense being that at the time of the purchase it was worth $1,500. The court held that the second issue should have been “the difference between the value of the machinery when delivered and the contract price.” The court had already said the same on the defendant’s appeal,—111 N. C.

92, 15 S. E. 940,—that this should be the abatement of the purchase price for breach of warranty. On this basis the defendant would be liable for $1,500, less payment $400,—i. e. $1,100,—and interest, which is evidently, upon the evidence and all the findings, the just result, if defendant’s evidence is to be believed. If plaintiff’s is to be believed, there should be no abatement, and a judgment for the purchase price less payment made of $400. On a rehearing—(1900) 126 N. C. 108, 35 S. E. 236—the court held that as an abstract proposition the defendant could show what such a machine as he had contracted for “could have been bought on the market,” else a buyer would lose the profit of a good bargain if he had bought at less than the market price; but further held that, inasmuch as the defendant in his answer had averred that the valor to deliver the brick, and his inability to obtain them elsewhere, he was hindered and delayed in finishing the sewer, to show the damages suffered by him. Ramsey v. Tully, 12 Ill. App. 463.

So, damages for breach of a contract to furnish machinery, which could not be procured in the market, to a projected limited partnership thereafter organized by the parties purchasing as general partners, but who notified the vendor that they had agreed to organize a limited partnership of which they were to be the sole members, and that they made the contract to enable them profitably to carry on business in their new organization, may include loss suffered from consequent inability successfully to establish and fit out the proposed business. Abbott v. Hapgood, 150 Mass. 248, 5 L. R. A. 586, 22 N. E. 907.

And where a manufacturer of flues for curing tobacco contracted with a tobacco raiser to deliver certain flues to him which he never sent, and the raiser tried to buy flues elsewhere, but could not do so, and then borrowed from a neighbor some old cast-off flues in bad condition, by the use of which his tobacco was injured, such injury is the necessary consequence of the breach, and the manufacturer is liable therefor; since it must be deemed common knowledge, in localities where tobacco is cultivated, that if it is not cut and cured in a certain time serious loss is the necessary consequence. Neal v. Pender-Hyman Hardware Co. 122 N. C. 104, 29 S. E. 96.

b. Measure of damages.

1. In case of total absence of market.

Since a purchaser is entitled to have the goods purchased, in case of breach of the contract by the vendor when there is a total absence of a market in which to obtain them he may, as a general rule, procure their production as economically as possible, and hold the vendor chargeable with the difference between the cost of production and the contract price.

The damages suffered from a breach of contract to sell and deliver an article is not what the article would be worth to the purchaser after he had procured it, but what it would cost him to procure it. Barnes v. Seligman, 55 Hun, 339, 8 N. Y. Supp. 834.

When goods cannot be bought in market, and there is no market within a reasonable distance, the measure of damages for breach by the vendor of a contract for the sale thereof is still the difference between the contract price and the higher value of the goods at the place of delivery, and this must be ascertained by an investigation into what it would cost the purchaser, acting in good faith and with due diligence and reasonable prudence, to procure, in the condition required by the contract and delivered at the place therein named for delivery, the kind and quantity of goods contracted for, the investigation sometimes involving an inquiry into the cost of producing or manufacturing at or near the place of delivery of the article contracted for. Paine v. Sherwood, 21 Minn. 226.

Thus, in Haskell v. Hunter, 23 Mich. 305, it was held that the true test of proper compensation for a breach of contract to sell and deliver a quantity of pine flooring is what it would have cost the purchaser to procure at the point of delivery, and at the time or times when it was reasonable and proper for him to supply himself lumber of the kind and quality he was to receive under the contract; and, if it is impracticable to supply himself except at retail rates, he is entitled to recover at such rates from the vendor.

And in Bush v. Fisher, 85 Mo. App. 1, the measure of damages for breach of a contract for the sale and delivery of cord wood, where it had no market price at the place of delivery, was held to be the difference between the agreed price and its reasonable value at the place of delivery at the time it was to have been delivered.

So, the measure of damages for breach of a contract to deliver certain specified stock is the difference between the contract price and what it would cost to procure such stock, though such stock would be worthless in the hands of the purchaser so far as money value is concerned, and though the only method of procuring it would be by a payment of the face value thereof into the treasury of the company and causing it to be issued by the corporation in consideration of such payment. Barnes v. Seligman, 55 Hun, 339, 8 N. Y. Supp. 834.

And in case of breach of warranty of capacity of machinery sold which had been accepted by the vendee the rule of damages is the difference between the value of the machine received and what it would have cost the vendee to purchase such a machine as that described in the contract and warranty. Huyett & S. Mfg. Co. v. Gray, 126 N. C. 108, 35 S. E. 236.

It is to be observed that the element of no market value does not appear in the above case. But the rule was adopted on a rehearing granted in Huyett & S. Mfg. Co. v. Gray, 124 N. C. 322, 32 S. E. 718, slightly modifying the rule there laid down that the measure of dam-ue of such a machine as he had contracted for was $2,337, the error in the former decision was not detrimental, and dismissed the petition to rehear, though correcting the abstract proposition of law to conform to Marsh v. McPherson, 105 U. S. 709, 26 L. ed. 1139. When the case went back, the judge below allowed the defendant to amend his answer to allege that such a machine as he had contracted for would have been worth $3,500. The jury evidently so found, as they assessed defendant's damages at $2,000, assessing $1,400 again as the deterioration, and the defendant's evidence being that the remains were worth $100,—i. e. that the machine was worth $1,500 when bought, on which only $400 had been paid,—but that the machine such as he had contracted for would have been worth $3,500. Deducting $2,000 abatement for breach of warranty from the balance of $1,937 due on the purchase money, the defendant again recovered $63 and costs, besides the free use of the machinery till worn out, and even keeps $100 of scrap iron still left. But it appeared from defendant's evidence that there is no dry kiln in the market that would "dry 25,000 feet of North Carolina green sap pine with 80 horse power boiler and 60 pound pressure." The defendant thereupon asked the following instruction, which should have been given: "If the jury find that there was no apparatus on the market which had the capacity claimed for that in question, then what its value was would be speculative, and not a fair basis to estimate the damages; and in that case the measure of damages would be the difference in value between the apparatus as delivered and the contract price." In effect, under the ruling ages for breach of warranty of capacity of a machine sold is the difference between the purchase price and the value of the machine when received. And the principal case, which is a subsequent appeal in the same action, first brings to light the fact that the machine was one for which there was no market value, and reinstates the rule of 124 N. C. 322, 32 S. E. 718, on the ground that, there being no market value of the machine, what its value would have been if as warranted, would be speculative, and not a proper basis for damages.

So, the damages to be assessed for breach of contract to deliver coal tar, from which the purchaser intended to manufacture oil and fuel and use and sell it, there being no general market for the coal tar, and therefore no fixed market price; and it appearing that the nearest point from which it could be procured was a city a long distance away, and that it was costly and inconvenient to transport, and would cost three times the contract price to bring it,—are the difference between the market value of the manufactured oil and fuel and the cost of the coal tar in its crude form, with the cost of manufacture added. Equitable Gaslight Co. v. Baltimore Coal Tar & Mfg. Co. 65 Md. 73, 3 Atl. 108.

In the above case Grand Tower Min. Mfg. & Transp. Co. v. Phillips, 23 Wall. 471, 23 L. ed. 71, infra, II. b. 2, was distinguished upon the ground that the commodity in that case was coal, and that the rule applied to such an article, which is constantly and easily transported, might work great injustice if applied to such an article as coal tar, which is costly and difficult to transport to any distance.

Likewise, where one party agrees to furnish another with timber required for the construction of three bridges at a specified time, place, and price, and fails to do so, knowing the use which is to be made of it, and a purchaser employs men and sends them into the adjacent woods to procure the necessary timber to supply the deficiency, if there is no other way of procuring the timber or if that way is the ordinary and usual way, or is the most reasonable and prudent way of obtaining the timber contracted for,—then the vendor is bound to make good to the purchaser the difference between the cost of the timber and the contract price; but if this is an unusual and extraordinary mode of procuring the timber, the vendor will not, in the absence of special circumstances, be liable for anything more than the difference between the contract price and the cost of the timber procured in the usual and ordinary way. Paine v. Sherwood, 21 Minn. 225. 57 L. R. A.

And where a granite company agreed to furnish to a contractor having a contract for the erection of a building with granite of such quality and color as would meet the approval of the architect, which was required to be dressed in a certain manner and to fit a particular place, and to be in compliance with certain specifications, and there was no open market for such stone dressed in that manner, and a part of the structure was completed with granite already furnished, and he failed and refused to furnish the rest; and there were only two quarries available at which to obtain the stone, answering the requirements; and, in order to do so, he opened one of the two quarries,—the expense which he necessarily incurred in doing so, the payment of additional freight, and the expense of dressing the stone, are all elements to be considered in determining the cost of completing the contract, and the question of damages, with which the subcontractor was chargeable for his breach of contract. Gallagher v. Baird, 54 App. Div. 398, 86 N. Y. Supp. 759, Affirmed in 170 N. Y. 566, 62 N. E. 1095.

Reasonable value of the article purchased, however, has been adopted in cases in which the circumstances were such that the cost of production could not be ascertained, or would not furnish an accurate and satisfactory measure of damages.

Thus, breach of an agreement on the part of a railroad company to give a person a pass over its road for himself and family for his lifetime warrants a recovery by him, against the company, of such damages as a pass for life for himself and family would be worth, approximating certainty as closely as the nature of the case will admit. Erie & P. R. Co. v. Douthet, 88 Pa. 243, 32 Am. Rep. 451.

And the burden of proof rests with the plaintiff in such a case, since he knows the number of his family and the customary number of trips made by himself and them. Ibid.

And the measure of damages in an action for breach of warranty and for fraudulent misrepresentations in a sale of coupons of mortgage bonds of a street railway company, and for concealment of material facts on the part of the vendor, is, in the absence of evidence as to their value, the price of the coupons paid by the purchaser, with interest. South Covington & C. S. R. Co. v. Gest, 34 Fed. 628.

And in an action for breach of a contract for the exchange of bonds, in which it appears that the bonds of which a delivery was refused had no market value, evidence that the bonds were secured by a mortgage on a railroad to trustees a part of which had been graded, which was in our previous decisions, the issue should be only one,—simply, what was the value of the machinery when delivered? The defendant, having accepted and used the machinery, is, upon the evidence as heretofore uniformly given in his behalf, entitled to damages for breach of warranty by abating the purchase price down to the real value of the machinery when delivered, if the jury find there was a breach of warranty. The plaintiff's evidence has been that it was worth $2,337; the defendant's that it was worth $1,500. Whatever the jury find that it was, the agreed amount of payment,—$400—should be deducted, and the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment for the difference, with interest and costs. Any other result would be a miscarriage of justice. The defendant is not entitled to speculative damages for an ideal machine which was not on the market in 1889, and which, by his own evidence, is not on the market now. It could, therefore, have no market value. As the claim and delivery remedy is now out of the question, the issue as to deterioration has become useless. The above measure of damages has been laid down by us in all the previous decisions in this case, and the case must have gone off upon them but for the amendment allowing defendant to charge that he had contracted to buy a new machine worth $3,500 of the manufacturers for $2,337. This was an ideal valuation, as there was no such machine, and no market value for it. This his own evidence has established by showing that no machine of that description was then or is now made. If defendant insists on his damages being assessed in a separate issue, the court should give above instruction if there is evidence to worth about the amount the bonds, is competent, on the question of the damages suffered, to prove the value of the bonds. Murray v. Stanton, 90 Mass. 345.

2. When goods were obtainable at other markets.

Where there is no market price for goods at a place where they are to be delivered by reason of the want of dealers or the want of the commodity, then the actual value at such place can be ascertained, for the purpose of determining the amount of damages for failure to deliver, by proof of the market value in other markets with the cost of transportation added or deducted as the case may be; such other markets to be at the nearest convenient point where goods of the quality and quantity can be bought or sold. McDonald v. Unaka Timber Co. 88 Tenn. 38, 12 S. W. 420; Paine v. Sherwood, 21 Minn. 225; Furlong v. Polleys, 30 Me. 491, 50 Am. Dec. 685; Cobb v. Whitsett, 51 Mo. App. 146; Stevens v. Lyford, 7 N. H. 360.

And this would be the measure of damages in such case, and not what it cost the purchaser to procure a supply of the goods at that place. Furlong v. Polleys, 30 Me. 491, 50 Am. Dec. 685.

In such case the goods may be bought in the nearest market or where they can be procured on the most advantageous terms, and the additional cost and expense be charged to the vendor, who failed to comply with his contract. Vickery v. McCormick, 117 Ind. 594, 20 N. E. 495.

Thus, the measure of damages where a vendor of a quantity of cotton fails and refuses to deliver to the purchaser the goods sold, and the price has not been paid, and it is practicable for the purchaser to obtain the goods elsewhere, is the excess of the cost of such goods over the contract price, together with such reasonable expense and loss as are necessarily incurred in procuring them. McFadden v. Henderson, 128 Ala. 221, 29 So. 640.

And proof that a purchaser of cotton, after being notified by the vendor of his refusal to deliver the cotton, went into the market and purchased the quantity contracted for as quickly and cheaply as possible at a loss of a designated amount per bale, is admissible in evidence, in an action for the breach, to show the amount of damages which should be allowed, where it appears that he could not purchase the cotton at the place of delivery. Ibid.

And evidence of the price of hay at a place 3 miles away from the place of delivery is admissible in an action for damage for breach of 57 L. R. A.

contract to deliver hay, there being no market for it at the place of delivery. Delfendorf v. Gage, 7 Barb. 18.

So, where a party contracts to deliver logs at a particular place and within a definite time, and no payment has been made, and there is no market value therefor at the time and place of delivery, their value at the nearest point which affords a market and at which sales are usually made should be ascertained in determining the amount of damages sustained by the breach. Berry v. Dwinel, 44 Me. 255.

And breach of a contract for the sale and delivery of a large quantity of white oak lumber of a certain grade and quality to be used in the construction of an insane asylum, where such lumber cannot be had in the market at the place where the asylum is to be built, warrants the purchaser in buying at the nearest market where it can be procured on advantageous terms, and in charging the additional cost and expense to the vendor. Vickery v. McCormick, 117 Ind. 594, 20 N. E. 495.

And, in the absence of an actual market for goods of a certain quantity and quality, such as lumber, at the place of delivery, the true value there may be ascertained, for the purpose of determining the amount of damages occasioned by nondelivery, by proof of the market value at the nearest point where such quantity and quality of goods could be bought and sold, and to which goods from the place of delivery were usually sent for the market, with a deduction for cost of transportation, though it appears that a limited number of sales of such goods in small quantities had been made at nearer places. McDonald v. Unaka Timber Co. 88 Tenn. 38, 12 S. W. 420.

And where, in an action for breach of contract for the sale and delivery of a quantity of spruce plank, there is no evidence of the value of such plank at the place of delivery, evidence is admissible as to its value at other places, not only in the neighborhood of the place of delivery, but also at distant places where there is a market for it, in connection with proof of the expense of transportation between such places and the place of delivery. Wemple v. Stewart, 22 Barb. 154.

So, the measure of damages for breach of contract for the sale of a large number of patent fruit jars by failure of the vendor to deliver a part of the jars contracted to be delivered, where the articles could not then be had in the market at the place of delivery, is the difference between the contract price and what they could be purchased for in the nearest market, together with the additional cost that purport. If the jury find that the machine did not come up to the warranty, the defendant should pay for the real value at the time of purchase of the machine he bought, used, and wore out; and, if it is less than the contract price, it is for the jury to assess its value at date of purchase, and the court should deduct the admitted payment, and, as already said, render judgment for the balance, with interest from date when purchase money was due, without, of course, the attorney's fee of 10 per cent stipulated for in the contract (Turner v. Boger, 126 N. C. 300, 40 L. R. A. 590, 35 S. E. 592, and cases cited), and for costs.

Error.

of getting them to the place of delivery. Capen v. De Stelger Glass Co. 105 Ill. 185.

And breach of contract for the sale of a large quantity of coal to be delivered at stated times and in stated quantities, by a failure to deliver, warrants a recovery, where there was no market at which coal could be purchased at the place of delivery except that made by the vendor itself, of the price the purchaser would have had to pay for it in the quantities it was entitled to receive under the contract, at the nearest available market where it could be obtained, less the price stipulated for by the contract, with the addition of the increased expense of transportation and hauling. Grand Tower Min. Mfg. & Transp. Co. v. Phillips, 23 Wall. 471, 23 L. ed. 71.

In ascertaining the measure of damages for the nonperformance of a contract to deliver an article of merchandise at a fixed time and at a specified place, however, evidence of the value of the article at other places in the vicinity of the place of delivery is inadmissible where the evidence is clear and explicit as to the value thereof at the place of delivery; but when the evidence as to such value is not clear, evidence as to its value at other places may be resorted to, to ascertain the value at the place of delivery. Gregory v. McDowell, 8 Wend. 435.

And the price of coal at neighboring places where coal is distributed and sold, though it may afford a basis for estimating the profits which a purchaser of coal might have made had that stipulated for been delivered, cannot be adopted in an action for breach of the contract of sale as a guide to the actual damage sustained, so long as any more direct method is within reach. Grand Tower Min. Mfg. & Transp. Co. v. Phillips, 23 Wall. 471, 23 L. ed. 71.

3. When goods were obtainable at other times.

Where, in an action for breach by a vendor of a contract of sale, there had been no sales of the article in question at the exact time when the contract called for the delivery, it is proper to show the price of it immediately before and after that time. Dana v. Fiedler, 1 E. D. Smith, 463.

And where in an action for breach of a contract for the sale and delivery of logs and lumber it appears that the lumber had no market value, it is not reversible error to permit evidence as to what the logs and lumber agreed to be furnished by the contract were worth from the time of the failure to deliver to the time of the institution of the suit. Pape v. Ferguson (Ind.) 62 N. E. 712.

But the range of the market value of madder for the period of three months before and after the day when, by the contract in question, delivery was due, is properly excluded in an action for breach of contract for the delivery of a quantity of madder, though no sales were shown on the precise day of delivery, where sales were shown to have taken place within about two weeks of that time, as in such case the question is too broad. Dana v. Fiedler, 12 N. Y. 40, 62 Am. Dec. 130, 1 E. D. Smith, 463.

4. When purchased for special purpose.

(a) The general rule.

The rule that the measure of damages for breach of a contract of sale is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place of delivery does not apply where a specific article is bought for a specific purpose known to the vendor at the time of sale, and such article cannot be had in the market, or has no ascertainable value. Ramsey v. Tully, 12 Ill. App. 463; Benton v. Fay, 64 Ill. 417; Den Bleyker v. Gaston, 97 Mich. 354, 56 N. W. 763.

Where parties contract for articles with reference to use or sale on some particular occasion, and by reason of want of time, or their situation in respect to the market, they would, on failure to receive them on the contract, be unable to supply themselves for that occasion, and the party contracting to supply them is advised of the special purpose of the thing, and damage naturally accrues from failure to complete it, the party breaking the contract is responsible for such damage as is the direct and natural result of his failure, though beyond the mere difference between the contract and market price. Richardson v. Chynoweth, 26 Wis. 656.

In such case the vendor will be held to have contracted with reference to the known purpose, not merely in respect to the kind and quality of the goods, but also in respect to the injury to result from a breach,—especially when it is evident that in case of the breach the vendee will be unable to obtain like goods in time to accomplish such purpose. Stewart v. Power, 12 Kan. 596.

(b) For resale.

Where the article sold cannot be obtained in the market or elsewhere so that the purchaser cannot supply himself with it from other sources, the measure of damages for breach of the contract to deliver it is the actual loss which he has sustained, and if he has made sale of the article to another, and by reason of the failure of his vendor to deliver he is prevented from filling his contract with his purchaser, his measure of damages is the difference between the price at which he sold and the price which he had agreed to pay. Loescher v. Deisterberg, 26 Ill. App. 521; Booth v. Spuyten Duyvil Rolling Mill Co. 60 N. Y. 487; Trigg v. Clay, 88 Va. 330, 13 S. E. 434; Grébert-Borgnis v. Nugent, L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 85, 54 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 511; Borries v. Hutchinson, 18 C. B. N. S. 445, 34 L. J. C. P. N. S. 169, 11 Jur. N. S. 267, 11 L. T. N. S. 771, 13 Week. Rep. 386.

Unless the price in the subcontract is shown to be extravagant, or of an unusual and exceptional character. Booth v. Spuyten Duyvil Rolling Mill Co. 60 N. Y. 487.

Thus, the measure of damages for breach of a contract of sale of boiler tubes at an agreed price, upon the faith of which the purchaser contracted with a third party to sell the goods to him at an advanced price, where no other article of a similar kind could be procured in the market, is the amount he lost by reason of not being able to perform his agreement to deliver the pipe to the third person at an advanced price. McKay v. Riley, 65 Cal. 623, 4 Pac. 667.

So, the damages for breach of a contract for the manufacture and delivery of plow fenders to be completed at a designated time, designed, to the knowledge of the vendor, for sale to farmers for use in cultivating crops during that season, may be based on the expected profits of a resale thereof, where such fenders were a new appliance which could not be found in the market, and the purchaser endeavored to make contracts with other factories to have the fenders manufactured after the failure of the vendor to comply with his agreement, but was unable to do so except at a considerable advance in price, and then too late for their proper advertisement to farmers. Guenther v. Taylor, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 536, 63 S. W. 439.

And the measure of damages for breach of a contract for the sale and delivery of a quantity of binding twine, where the purchaser was unable to purchase twine of the same character and description, and the vendor knew at the time of the purchase that it was made with a view to a resale, is the difference between the selling price plus the freight thereon to the place of resale, and the price for which it could have been sold by the purchaser at his place of business. Bluegrass Cordage Co. v. Luthy & Co. 98 Ky. 583, 33 S. W. 835.

And where a manufacturer of hats employed an agent in a city as sole agent for that place, and such agent ordered a large quantity of his hats, which were well known and worn exclusively by many persons, and the manufacturer afterwards revoked the agency and refused to send a part of the hats ordered, the jury, in an action for the breach, should take into consideration what the purchaser would have made had he sold all the hats, in connection with the probability as to how many of them he could sell, and how many he would have to carry over beyond the season, and the probability as to his losing some accounts, and the question whether his demand for such hats might have been supplied by hats of some other manufacture. More v. Knox, 52 App. Div. 145, 64 N. Y. Supp. 1101.

And evidence, in such case, as to the value of such hats at retail in the place where they were to be sold is admissible, where the only possible way by which the agent could fill his orders, if at all, was by purchasing such hats of another agent appointed in his place at retail prices, not to establish the measure of damages, but as a fact to be considered by the jury to enable them to ascertain in the best manner possible the value of the hats, and to adjust the damages for the breach. Ibid.

So, one who, having a French customer in Paris, contracted with another for a supply of skins of a particular shape and description, at specified prices, to enable him to fulfil his contract with the Paris customer, which corresponded substantially with the contract with the vendor, the vendor knowing all the terms of his contract with the Paris customer except the price, is entitled to recover of the vendor, upon breach thereof, there being no market for goods of the description contracted for, not only the amount of profits he would have made had he been able to fulfil his contract with the Paris customer, but also such damages as he was compelled to pay to the Paris customer for breach of his contract with him; and in estimating such damages the determination of the French court in which he was sued will be taken as determining the proper amount, in the absence of any showing that it was unreasonable. Grébert-Borgnis v. 47 L. R. A.

In the above case Borries v. Hutchinson, 18 C. B. N. S. 445, 34 L. J. C. P. N. S. 169, 11 Jur. N. S. 267, 11 L. T. N. S. 771, 13 Week. Rep. 386, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the particulars of the penalties were not made known to the defendant, and therefore he was not held liable for them.

Extraordinary and unusual profits, however, lost by a purchaser of goods on account of the vendor's failure to comply with his agreement, cannot be recovered as damages for breach of the contract of sale, although the vendor had reason to know that there was no established market price for such goods, and knew that the goods were bought to fill a previous contract with a third person, if he did not know, and could not reasonably have been presumed to have in contemplation, a price which would yield such profit. Guetzkow Bros. Co. v. A. H. Andrews & Co. 92 Wis. 214, 52 L. R. A. 209, 66 N. W. 119.

And the damages which a purchaser of caustic soda is entitled to recover for breach of a contract of sale, where the vendor knew at the time of the sale that the vendee bought it to sell again on the continent, but did not know that it was to be sold in Russia, although he learned it afterwards, there being no market for caustic soda, are the loss of profit on the sale which the vendee had contracted to make, together with the increased cost of freight and insurance in Russia, but do not include damages which he was compelled to pay to his vendee for the breach of a subcontract of sale made by him to a consumer of the article. Borries v. Hutchinson, 18 C. B. N. S. 445, 34 L. J. C. P. N. S. 169, 11 Jur. N. S. 267, 11 L. T. N. S. 771, 13 Week. Rep. 386.

And while one who, having a contract with a Russian railway company to deliver a quantity of wagons, with a penalty for failure or delay to do so, enters into a contract with another by which the latter is to furnish a quantity of wheels and axles, made according to tracings which are to be used in making the wagons, the manufacturer being informed of the contract with the Russian railway company, but not of the penalty therein contained, is entitled to recover of the manufacturer, where the manufacturer delays the completion of his work, and as such wheels and axles cannot be obtained in any market, and the purchaser is delayed and has to pay a penalty to the Russian company, a reasonable compensation for the loss of the use of the wagons during the period of delay,—he is not entitled to damages, as matter of right, for the amount of the penalties paid by him. Elbinger Actien-Gesellschaft v. Armstrong, L. R. 9 Q. B. 473, 23 Week. Rep. 127, 43 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 211, 30 L. T. N. S. 871.

So, one who purchased a quantity of orange shellac from another, which goods were not procurable in the market, for the purpose of fulfilling a contract of resale, the vendor not knowing of the subcontract, but knowing that the purchase was made for the purpose of resale, is not entitled to recover, on failure of his vendor to perform his contract, thereby preventing him from performing his, for the loss of the profits on the subsale. Thiol v. Henderson, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 457.

In the above case Borries v. Hutchinson, 18 C. B. N. S. 445, 34 L. J. C. P. N. S. 169, 11 Jur. N. S. 267, 11 L. T. N. S. 771, 13 Week. Rep. 386, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the existence of the subcontract was known to the seller at the time of the sale, or, at all events, the fact was known to the seller that the goods were purchased for a specific purpose, and that, delivery being required for that specific purpose, the buyer would incur loss by such nondelivery as would prevent his effecting that specific purpose.

The mere circumstance, however, that a vendor does not know the precise price specified in a contract between his vendee and another will not exonerate him from liability for the difference between the principal contract price and the subcontract price for breach of his contract, where the goods cannot be otherwise obtained. It is only requisite that the parties should have such knowledge of special circumstances affecting the question of damages, as that it may be fairly inferred that they contemplated a particular rule or standard for estimating them, and entered into the contract upon that basis. Booth v. Spuyten Duyvil Rolling Mill Co. 60 N. Y. 487.

And a reasonable and fair profit lost by a purchaser of goods may be recovered as damages, for the failure of the vendor to comply with his agreement, where he had reason to know that there was no established market price for such goods, and knew what the goods were bought for, although he did not know the price that was to be obtained by the vendee under his contract with a third person. Guetzkow Bros. Co. v. A. H. Andrews & Co. 92 Wis. 214, 52 L. R. A. 209, 66 N. W. 119.

And one who agrees to make and deliver at his mill a specified quantity of steel caps for railway rails, knowing that the other party has a contract with a railway company for making rails, and that the steel caps are to be used and are necessary to enable him to perform his contract, both parties being aware that such caps cannot be procured elsewhere in season to enable the purchaser to fulfil his agreement, and that such caps have no market value when separated from the rest of the rail, is liable, on failure to perform his contract by not manufacturing and delivering a large number of the steel caps, for the difference between the subcontract price and the principal contract price. Booth v. Spuyten Duyvil Rolling Mill Co. 60 N. Y. 487.

So, the jury, in an action against a contractor for the removal of dead animals from a city for breach of a contract to sell and deliver the carcasses of all animals collected in the city for a specified period, to be delivered as rapidly as the health laws require, may take into consideration, for the purpose of measuring the damages, the amount of net profits which the evidence shows the plaintiff, who had a factory in which, by certain processes, he manufactured various portions of such carcasses into valuable and marketable commodities, would have made by his process with his machinery from the number of animals which the defendant had gathered, and which, under the contract, he had agreed to deliver. Sternfels v. Clark, 2 Hun, 122, Affirmed in 70 N. Y. 608.

And where a wine merchant, having a customer whose ship was about to sail, purchased a quantity of champagne from a wine broker for such customer for delivery on his ship, and the wine broker refused to deliver the wine, and champagne of that brand and quality was not obtainable in the market, so as to enable him to purchase a substitute, the rule of damages in the action against the wine broker for conversion is to ascertain the actual value of the goods at the time of the conversion by determining what the customer, who was solvent, had agreed to pay for them. France v. Gaudet, L. R. 6 Q. B. 199, 40 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 121, 19 Week. Rep. 622.

And one who had a contract to make a machine called a gunpowder pile driver, who made a contract with another for a part of the machine called a gun, the manufacturer being aware that the machine was wanted at a certain time, but failing to finish the gun until about a month later, when the person ordering the machine refused to accept it, is entitled to recover of the person from whom he ordered the gun the profits which he would have made upon his contract for the whole machine, together with the expenditure uselessly incurred by him in making other parts of it. Hydraulic Engineering Co. v. McHaffie, L. R. 4 Q. B. Div. 677, 27 Week. Rep. 221.

So, in Stroud v. Austin, 1 Cab. & El. 119, it was held that the price fixed on a subsale of goods by a purchaser is evidence of the value of the goods in an action for damages for non-delivery by the first vendor, where the same class of goods is not obtainable in the market at the place of delivery, and the amount by which such price on such subsale exceeds the contract price may be recovered as damages, although the vendor at the time of the contract had no notice of the subsale.

(c) To be sent to a market at another place.

Where goods sold have no market price at the place of delivery, but were purchased for the purpose of being sent to another place, the market price at the place to which they were to be sent, less the cost of transportation, is the measure of their value at the place of delivery, in an action for breach of contract for failure to deliver them. Vanstone v. Hopkins, 49 Mo. App. 386.

Thus, where timber of a certain kind is sold to be delivered at a designated place, the vendor knowing that it is to be transported by the purchaser from the place of delivery to another place at which there is a market therefor, there being no market at the place of delivery, the vendee, in case of failure of the vendor to deliver a part of the lumber sold, is entitled to recover according to the market value of the lumber at the place where it is intended to be sold, deducting the cost of transportation. Hendrie v. Neelon, 12 Ont. App. Rep. 41.

So, the same rule was applied to a breach of contract for the sale of a quantity of dressed poplar door framing, in Campbellville Lumber Co. v. Bradlee, 96 Ky. 494, 29 S. W. 313.

And where a purchaser of lumber purchased it for shipment to a specified market, he is entitled to have the benefit of the market price at that place in the estimate of his damages for breach by the vendor of the contract of sale, deducting the cost of transportation, whether he actually intended to sell it in that market or not; and the jury, in an action for the breach, should not be restricted in their consideration of the market price at that place, to the effect which it might have in throwing light upon the real state of the market at the place of delivery. Cockburn v. Ashland Lumber Co. 54 Wis. 619, 12 N. W. 49.

So, the value of cheese in a large city, and the cost of transportation there from a smaller place, though some distance away, is competent evidence in an action for damages for procuring the breach of a contract for the delivery of a large quantity of cheese at the smaller place, where the only market for cheese at that place was for the purpose of transportation and sale in the larger place. Rice v. Manley, 66 N. Y. 82, 23 Am. Rep. 30.

And where a contract for the sale and delivery of a quantity of coal is broken by failure of the vendor to deliver it as stipulated, and there is no market price for coal at the place of delivery except that made by the vendor, and the vendor knows that the coal is purchased to be used in another place, such place being the nearest market, the measure of damages for the breach is the difference between the market price in the latter place and the contract price, with the expense of transportation added. Johnson v. Allen, 78 Ala. 387, 56 Am. Rep. 34.

Likewise, the purchaser under a contract for the sale in Canton of a quantity of tea at designated prices, the same to be fresh, prime, and first chop, is entitled to recover, upon a breach of the contract by furnishing tea of inferior quality, under a rule by which the sales of the teas at the market where they were disposed of are compared with sales of other teas,—not as furnishing the amount, but the rate of the loss, and by applying this rate to the price of the article of the first quality at Canton. Gilpins v. Consequa, 3 Wash. C. C. 184, Fed. Cas. No. 5,452.

And breach of warranty in a contract of sale of goods known as scarlet cuttings, consisting of small pieces of scarlet cloth, in which dealings were carried on with the Chinese, and which were to be used in China, and which, in the condition in which they were delivered, were of no use or value to the vendee, warrants a recovery by him against the vendor, based upon the value they would have been to him in China. Bridge v. Wain, 1 Starkie, 504.

But the rule that the measure of damages for breach of contract to deliver goods at a stated place which were to be sent to another place is the difference between the value of the goods and the market price at the place to which they were to be sent, less the cost of transportation, is inapplicable in an action for the breach, where there is no evidence as to the cost of transportation from the place of delivery to the place where they were to be sent. Vanstone v. Hopkins, 49 Mo. App. 386.

Whenever a thing is to be supplied for a specific personal use, which from its nature has no market value—as is commonly understood by that term, the measure of damages for breach of the contract would be the difference between the contract price and the price at which the purchaser might or did supply himself after the use of ordinary care to get it upon the cheapest and best terms he reasonably could. Downey v. Hatter (Tex. Civ. App.) 48 S. W. 32.

Thus, where in case of breach of contract to furnish iron columns and beams taken from an old building, which contract was not fulfilled, it appears that they were specially adapted to the plan of the purchaser for a new building, and he was compelled to supply the deficiency by means of other columns conforming to such plans, the cost of the substituted material might furnish the measure of his actual damages for the breach of contract, where no other like columns could be had, or where the failure to secure such columns hindered the purchaser in the erection of his proposed building; but this rule cannot be applied where, without any apparent cause, he abandoned the plan of erecting any building. Warren v. A. B. Mayer Mfg. Co. 161 Mo. 112, 61 S. W. 644.

And while evidence of the value of that character of iron at the time given by those acquainted with the market value thereof is the only feasible means of estimating the damages in an action for a breach of contract where there is a market value therefor, if there is none, the next best evidence would be its value, ascertained from persons whose experience in dealing in iron of that character would enable them to state its value there as scrap iron, or as comparatively new iron designed for the same purpose. Ibid.

Where the vendee is unable to supply himself after the breach, and the product for the making of which the article purchased was intended suffers injury because of the failure to secure it, he will be entitled to recover the difference in value between the product as it was and as it should have been had the article purchased been received.

Thus, failure upon the part of a person to perform a contract to make and put in operation, on the plantation of the other party thereto, a sugar mill and steam engine, in time to take off the sugar crop thereon, where it may be inferred that it entered into the contemplation of the parties that the work was to be done for the purpose of taking off such crop, entitles the plantation owner to recover damages for his loss of crop and for extra wages paid in consequence of the delay, and for alterations and repairs in putting the mill and engine in operation. Goodloe v. Rogers, 9 La. Ann. 273, 61 Am. Dec. 205.

And one who contracts to sell and deliver to a farmer a threshing machine within a specified time, knowing it to be the farmer's practice to thresh wheat in the field and send it thence to market, who fails to deliver it at the specified time, but repeatedly assures the farmer that it shall be sent at once, after which the farmer, having unsuccessfully tried to hire another machine, is obliged to carry home and stack the wheat, which, while so stacked, is damaged by rain, and it is found necessary to kiln-dry it, and when dried and sent to market it sells for a less price,—is liable to the farmer with respect to the expense of stacking the wheat and the loss arising from its deterioration by the rain and the expense of drying it in the kiln, but not for damages with respect to the fall in the market price. Smeed v. Foord, 1 El. & El. 602, 28 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 178, 5 Jur. N. S. 291.

So, one who contracted with a butcher to furnish him for a specified time all the ice he might require for his ice box in which he kept fresh meat, understanding the use which was to be made of the ice, who stopped supplying ice during such period and refused longer to furnish it, by reason of which the butcher, without any fault or negligence on his part to procure the necessary ice elsewhere, lost a large quantity of meat, is liable, not only for the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the market value of the goods at the time the contract was broken, but also for the meat spoiled in consequence of the inability of the butcher to procure ice elsewhere. Hammer v. Schoenfelder, 47 Wis. 455, 2 N. W. 1129.

And one who contracted with a city for a supply of water with which to water his plants and supply his boiler so as to heat his greenhouse, which supply of water was cut off on account of the negligent exposure of a water pipe connected with his greenhouse in the construction of a sewer, so that the water in the pipe froze, by reason of which his plants were destroyed, is entitled to recover from the city for their destruction, where he could not, by the use of reasonable diligence, obtain a supply of water or heat from other sources, and the city had due notice that if the water was suffered to remain cut off the plants would be destroyed. Stock v. Boston, 149 Mass. 410, 21 N. E. 871; Watson v. Needham, 161 Mass. 404, 24 L. R. A. 287, 37 N. E. 204.

And where one party agreed to sell and deliver to another a specified quantity of fertilizer at a stipulated price, knowing that it was intended for use on the purchaser's cotton crop to be raised that year, and under repeated promises by the vendor to deliver the whole in due time the purchaser delayed making efforts to purchase elsewhere until too late to do so, and the vendor delivered part of the quantity ordered, which part was used upon a part of the purchaser's crop, all of which was cultivated in a farmer-like manner; and the portion upon which the fertilizer was used produced much more per acre than that adjoining,—the damages for breach of contract may be measured by the loss suffered from the depreciated production of cotton on the land upon which the purchaser intended to use the fertilizer, if that loss appears to be the natural and proximate consequence of the failure to deliver. Bell v. Reynolds, 78 Ala. 511, 56 Am. Rep. 52.

So, where a vendor fails to perform a contract of sale of an article designed for use by the vendee in his business, and an article of the same quantity cannot be procured in the market, he is entitled to recover damages, the measure of which would be the actual loss which the vendee sustains by not receiving the advance on the contract price upon any contract which he has himself made, in reliance upon the fulfillment of the contract by the vendor. Culin v. Woodbury Glass Works, 103 Pa. 220.

Thus, where a machine was sold with warranty as to its capacity, and it was not of the warranted capacity, and the vendor was aware of the fact that a machine such as he had undertaken to supply could not be procured in the market, and that the purchaser purchased this one for use in his business, and would make contracts involving its operation, and the purchaser lost a contract because of the defective capacity of the machine,—he is entitled to recover, for the breach, the difference between what it would have cost him to fulfil the contract and what he would have received if he had not been prevented from doing so. Carroll-Porter Roller & Tank Co. v. Columbus Mach. Co. 5 C. C. A. 190, 3 U. S. App. 631, 55 Fed. 451.

And where, in such case, the purchaser made a contract which he could not carry out because of the defective capacity of the machine, and he would be compelled either to abandon his contract or to acquire the use of a machine elsewhere; and where the character of the machine was such that he could not bring it to the work,—he would be entitled to take the work to the machine, and recover, for the breach, the difference between the sum he had to pay for taking the work to the machine and what it would have cost him to do the work himself had the machine been of the warranted capacity. Ibid.

So, where a manufacturer contracts for the purchase of a large quantity of iron, having heavy contracts for iron to be furnished shortly afterwards, and the vendor neglects and refuses to furnish it, by reason of which the manufacturer, in order to fulfil his contract, is obliged to get an inferior quality of iron, and, being inferior, loses one of his contracts for the sale and delivery of his goods,—the measure of damages for the breach is the actual loss which he sustains in his own manufacture by having to use an inferior article, or in not receiving the advance on his contract price upon any contracts which he has himself made in reliance upon the fulfilment of the contract by the vendor, his legitimate loss being the difference between the contract price he is to pay to his vendor and the price he is to receive. McClouse v. Fulmer, 73 Pa. 365.

And a subcontractor, who agrees with a contractor having a contract for the construction of a house, to furnish the trim and cabinet work therefor; and who fails to perform his contract knowing that the contractor has a contract for such construction, and that the materials he is to furnish are for that particular house, and that they are not such as can be supplied in the market but have to be got out, fashioned, and formed in accordance with a special design,—is liable, for the breach, for any damage the contractor may suffer under his contract for the construction of the house, though he is not informed as to the time within which the contractor is bound to complete it. Murdock v. Jones, 3 App. Div. 221, 38 N. Y. Supp. 461.

So, where a person purchased of a manufacturer a planing machine, selecting it with reference to its weight and finish, the contract being that he was to have the identical machine he had selected, and erected a building and prepared it at a large expense for the especial purpose of accommodating such machine; and the manufacturer refused to send him the machine purchased, having notice of the preparation therefor, by reason of which some time was lost before a machine could be put in operation,—the purchaser should be allowed to show, in an action for the breach, what would have been a fair rent for the use of the building and machinery if in running order during the time they lay idle in consequence of the refusal to deliver the machine, not to exceed, however, a period reasonably necessary for supplying another machine of similar character, after being advised of the vendor's refusal to send the machine purchased. Benton v. Fay, 64 Ill. 417.

One who purchases an article from another for which there is no market, intending it for a special purpose, the vendor supposing it to be for another and a more obvious and usual purpose, can recover, as damages for the non-delivery of the contract, the loss which would have been sustained had the article been put to the ordinary and usual use, and not that which he would have suffered had it been put to the use intended. And where one agrees to sell and deliver the hull of a floating boom derrick to coal merchants, the usual use of such a hull being for storing coal, and that being the use which the vendor supposes will be made of it, he is entitled, in case of failure to deliver, only for the loss of use of the hull as a store, and not for the loss of its use for shipping coal direct from the collieries into barges by means of large hydraulic cranes and machinery placed therein, which is the use for which the purchase is made, the vendor knowing nothing of such use and no hull having ever been previously used in that way. Cory v. Thames Iron Works & Ship Bldg. Co. L. R. 3 Q. B. 181, 37 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 68, 17 L. T. N. S. 495, 16 Week. Rep. 457.

5. Duty of vendee to avoid or reduce injury.

Where, in case of nondelivery or delay in delivery of goods agreed to be sold and delivered, it is practicable for its purchaser to obtain such goods elsewhere to take the place of those due from the vendor, it is his duty to do so as expeditiously and cheaply as he reasonably can, and hold the vendor responsible, if he was at fault, for the excess of cost over the contract price, and such reasonable expense and loss as are necessarily incurred in procuring them; and it is no excuse that there are no such goods for sale at the place of delivery, if by making effort in a reasonable and business-like way, he can obtain them on reasonable terms elsewhere. Watson v. Kirby, 112 Ala. 436, 20 So. 624.

Thus, where a contract is made for a supply of logs with which to keep the purchaser's mill running during the following sawing season, and the vendor fails to furnish the requisite quantity, the vendee cannot permit his mill to remain idle in order to recover full damages if he can obtain logs with which to run it from other sources; but the burden of proof is upon the vendor, in an action for damages for the breach, to show by a preponderance of evidence, that the vendee could have found other logs to manufacture at his mill. Hopkins v. Sanford, 41 Mich. 243, 2 N. W. 39.

And where a vendor of paper delayed its delivery beyond the time provided for in the contract, a purchaser was at liberty to refuse to take it; but if the vendor had the paper ready for delivery a few days after, and notified the purchaser, the purchaser cannot claim special damages on the ground that there was no market and he could not get the paper after it was thus ready for delivery. Parsons v. Sutton, 66 N. Y. 92.

Nor is one who, having a contract to repair a steam threshing engine, employs another to make a fire box for it, not informing him of his contract for the repair of the engine, entitled to recover, on the failure of the other to complete the fire box within the time specified, where the time between the time specified and that for the completion of the repairs to the engine was sufficient to have enabled him to get a fire box made elsewhere, damages which he was compelled to pay for failure to complete his contract for the repair of the engine. Portman v. Middleton, 4 C. B. N. S. 322, 27 L. J. C. P. N. S. 231, 4 Jur. N. S. 689.

But a purchaser of goods which cannot be obtained in the market at the place of delivery is not required, in order to recover special damages for breach of contract by the vendor, to go to other markets to procure such goods, in the absence of notice that the vendor would not perform his contract, since until such notice he is justified in relying on the contract with the vendor. Shouse v. Nelsaanger, 18 Mo. App. 236.

And where, in case of nondelivery or delay in the delivery of logs sold and agreed to be delivered for use in a mill, and which could not have been obtained elsewhere, the millowner had reason to expect early delivery and could not otherwise profitably employ his laborers, teams, etc., during the intervening period, he could reasonably keep such teams and laborers unemployed for a limited period at the cost of the party delaying the delivery. Watson v. Kirby, 112 Ala. 436, 20 So. 624.

And while it would have been the duty of one with whom another agreed to manufacture certain machines, which agreement was broken, to have supplied his want at some other factory and thus lightened the burden of the breach, had he known it in time, where he did not and could not learn that the other party would violate his contract until it was too late to make other arrangements proof as to the market value of the machines at the place at which the party was notified that they were intended for use is admissible in an action for the breach, as such intended use was an element of the injury sustained. Alabama Iron Works v. Hurley, 86 Ala. 217, 5 So. 418.

And evidence that a purchaser of lumber known as "deals" could have procured the deals to be manufactured at mills in other places is not admissible in an action for breach of contract for the sale of such lumber by the vendor, where there is no proof that the purchaser had notice that the vendor would not perform its contract, or that, after the time of the breach, he could have supplied himself at such place 57 L. R. A.

with deals of the grades and dimensions specified in the contract in season for the use he desired to make of them. Cockburn v. Ashland Lumber Co. 54 Wis. 619, 12 N. W. 49.

Nor can a vendee charge a vendor who fails to perform his contract of sale of an article not found in the market with special damages which he might have avoided or prevented by procuring a fair equivalent or substitute for the article sold.

And where one contracts to supply a thing which is not otherwise obtainable, and a fair equivalent or substitute may be had after the failure of the vendor to deliver according to his contract, and the purchaser has expended money beyond the contract price in procuring a substitute for the thing contracted for, the measure of damages for failure to deliver is the difference between the contract price and the cost of obtaining the best equivalent or substitute the purchaser can obtain on the occasion for the purpose. Tribune Co. v. Bradshaw, 20 Ill. App. 17.

Thus, special damages for breach of a contract to sell and deliver paper for a particular purpose will not be allowed on the ground that there was no market at the place of delivery, where it does not appear that the purchaser could not have found paper which would have substantially answered his purpose. Parsons v. Sutton, 66 N. Y. 92.

And the measure of damages for breach, by the vendor, of a contract of sale of a specified quantity of shirtings for which there was no market in the country, after which the purchaser procured other shirtings of a somewhat superior quality at an increase of price for which his vendee paid no advance in price, includes the difference between what the original vendee paid for the substituted shirtings, and the vendor's contract price, he having done the best he could to fulfil his contract. Hinde v. Liddell, L. R. 10 Q. B. 265, 23 Week. Rep. 650, 44 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 105, 32 L. T. N. S. 449.

And where a newspaper company sells the use of a page of its paper to another, and such other sells space to an advertiser for an advertisement, and the advertisement thus bargained for is omitted by the newspaper publisher, in determining the measure of damages for the breach the rule applicable to sales of personal property, that where the article is one that can be bought in the market the proper measure is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time of the breach, should be applied if an advertisement of like character is readily obtainable in the market; and if no such advertisement could be obtained, so as to invoke the application of a different rule, it is for the advertiser to make out such fact by proof, and in the absence of such proof that measure will be applied. Tribune Co. v. Bradshaw, 20 Ill. App. 17.

The value of lumber of a particular grade cut into strips, however, ought not to be determined in an action for breach of contract to furnish such lumber, in which it appears that there was no market therefor, by taking as a substitute lumber of a lower grade and rejecting as waste all which does not conform to the required grade. Den Bleyker v. Gaston, 97 Mich. 354, 56 N. W. 763.

And the difference between the cost of strips of lumber of a different grade, substituted for those contracted to be supplied, and the contract price would be the measure of damages for a breach of contract to supply strips of lumber of a specified kind, where it appears that there was no market for such lumber, only so far as such substitution was actually and in good faith made. Ibid.

III. Breach by vendee.

a. Rule in the entire absence of a market.

In the entire absence of a market the measure of damages for breach of agreement to purchase goods by refusal of the vendee to receive them, especially where the goods sold have not yet been produced or manufactured, is, as a general rule, the difference between the contract price and cost of production or manufacture, that being what the vendor loses by being prevented from completing the contract.

Where an article is agreed to be delivered which has no market value an investigation into the constituent elements of the cost to the party who contracted to furnish it becomes necessary in an action for the breach of the contract, and that compared with the contract price affords the measure of damages. Masterston v. Brooklyn, 7 Hill, 61, 42 Am. Dec. 38.

Thus, where lumber is contracted to be delivered, sawed according to order, and it is not sawed because of the purchaser's refusal to go on with the contract, the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the cost of manufacturing the lumber, including the cost of the timber and hauling the logs, loading the lumber on cars, and the freight thereon to the place of delivery. Black River Lumber Co. v. Warner, 93 Mo. 374, 6 S. W. 210.

So, the measure of damages for breach of an agreement by which one party was to manufacture a large quantity of phosphate between specified days, according to the other party's formula and under his superintendence, and deliver it to him when it was manufactured, by countermanding the order and refusing to furnish the formula and failing to supervise the work, as agreed, is the difference between the actual cost to the manufacturer per ton of such phosphate manufactured according to the formula of the purchaser, and as agreed in the contract, and the price per ton of such phosphate specified in such contract. Eckenrode v. Chemical Co. 55 Md. 51.

And the rule of damages in an action for breach of a contract by which one party sold and agreed to deliver a quantity of steel rails to another, to be rolled by it and drilled by it according to directions furnished by the latter, by refusal to furnish drilling directions and declining to take the rails, is the difference between the cost of doing the work, though the material had been already purchased, and the price to be paid for it. Hinckley v. Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Co. 121 U. S. 265, 30 L. ed. 967, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 875.

Likewise, the measure of damages for breach of a contract for the sale of 50,000 cigarettes, by refusal on the part of the purchaser to accept the full quantity, where it appears that there was no market for cigarettes of that particular manufacture in such large quantities, is the difference between the contract price and the cost of production. Kelso v. Marshall, 24 App. Div. 128, 43 N. Y. Supp. 728.

And where a contract for the delivery of marble wrought in a particular manner so as to be fitted for use in the erection of a public building is broken by a refusal to receive the marble, operations upon the building having been suspended, and the marble as prepared having no ascertained market value, the measure of damages is the difference between what the performance would have cost the party who agreed to prepare it and the price which the purchaser had agreed to pay for it. Masterston v. Brooklyn, 7 Hill, 61, 42 Am. Dec. 38.

And the difference between the contract price and the cost of production is the measure of damages for breach of a contract to take a large quantity of an article like silicate of soda, which was manufactured in large quantities only to fill orders, and was perishable in its nature, so that large quantities of it could not be kept in stock, while the demand was limited, and it had no market price, although the manufacturer was able to effect some sales at a price less than that fixed by the broken contract. Todd v. Gamble, 148 N. Y. 382, 52 L. R. A. 224, 42 N. E. 982, Affirming 74 Hun, 569, 26 N. Y. Supp. 662.

Before damages will be permitted to be measured for breach of a contract of sale by refusal to receive the goods sold, however, by the difference between the cost of production and the contract price, the plaintiff must show that the article had no market value; and upon conflicting evidence this is a question of fact for the jury, and not one of law for the court. Ibid.

But an instruction in such an action that the usual measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the cost of production is not a ground for reversal, where the attention of the court was not called to the fact that such a rule is only applicable where there is no market for the goods, and the jury found that there was no market, since in such case it will be regarded as a presentation of a mere abstract question of law which could not mislead the jury. Ibid.

Where it thus becomes necessary, in an action for a breach of a contract of sale, to go into an inquiry as to the actual cost of furnishing the thing sold at the place of delivery, the estimation should be made upon a substantial basis, and not left to rest upon the loose and speculative opinions of witnesses. The constituent elements of the cost should be ascertained from sound and reliable sources and from practical men having experience in the particular department of labor to which the contract relates; and the jury should scrutinize with care and watchfulness any speculative or conjectural account of the cost of furnishing the article that would result in an unequal bargain between the parties; and they should consider the risks and contingencies which are almost inseparable from the execution of contracts. Masterston v. Brooklyn, 7 Hill, 61, 42 Am. Dec. 38.

And where a contract was made for the delivery of goods, involving expense in preparing them and transporting them to the place of delivery, and the contract was broken, and there were fluctuations in the value of the labor and materials between the day of the breach and the time when the contract was to have been fully performed, such fluctuations in price should not be taken into account in ascertaining the amount of damages, which should be governed by the state of things existing at the time the contract was broken. Ibid.

When, however, the article sold has been prepared and is ready for delivery at the time of the breach the measure of damages will be, either the difference between the contract price and what could be got for it, or the contract price itself.

Thus, the damages in an action for the repudiation of a contract for the delivery of a large quantity of ore by a refusal to receive a balance of the ore called for in the contract after it was ready for delivery, is measured by the amount of the best offer which could be there obtained for it, that amount to be taken from the contract price, where there was no open market for it at the time because the selling season for the product of mines for that year had passed. Salem Iron Co. v. Lake Su- perior Consol. Iron Mines, 50 C. C. A. 213, 112 Fed. 239.

And where the subject-matter of the contract is a specific article, like lumber of a particular pattern to be manufactured by the vendor for the vendee, and the vendor has completed his contract and performed all that is required of him, his damages should be the contract price. Black River Lumber Co. v. Warner, 93 Mo. 374, 6 S. W. 210.

So, a manufacturer from whom a water wheel of a certain size and kind was ordered according to a specified measure and pattern for a stipulated price is entitled to recover, upon the refusal of the purchaser to accept it, the full amount of the contract price, and is not limited to the difference between the contract price and the market price of the article sold. Bookwalter v. Clark, 11 Biss. 126.

And the rule of damages in an action for the nonacceptance of property sold or contracted for, that the amount of the actual injury sustained by the vendor in consequence of such nonacceptance may be recovered, does not apply where the property is utterly worthless in his hands and not salable, as in cases where the articles contracted for were ones which the vendee had the exclusive right of making and vending under a patent. In such case the whole price agreed to be paid should be recovered. Allen v. Jarvis, 20 Conn. 38.

b. Rule where neighboring market may be reached.

Where, in case of breach of contract of sale, the place of delivery affords no market for the articles sold, and the vendee refuses to receive them, it is the duty of the vendor to send the goods to the nearest and most available market and there dispose of them in such a way as to produce the largest possible results, the difference between such results and the agreed price being the measure of damages for the breach. Anderson v. Frank, 45 Mo. App. 482; Halliday v. Leah, 85 Mo. App. 285.

The market value at the time and place of delivery of property contracted to be sold, which the purchaser refuses to receive, is to be ascertained, for the purpose of determining the damages suffered from the breach, in the absence of a market at the place of delivery, by proof of the market price at the nearest point where property of a like character could be bought and sold, with the additional cost of transportation. White v. Matador Land & Cattle Co. 75 Tex. 465, 12 S. W. 866; McDonald v. Unaka Timber Co. 88 Tenn. 38, 12 S. W. 420; Cahen v. Platt, 69 N. Y. 348, 25 Am. Rep. 203.

Such proof is given, not for the purpose of establishing a market price at any other place, but for the purpose of showing the market price at the place of delivery. Cahen v. Platt, 69 N. Y. 348, 25 Am. Rep. 203.

Thus, refusal by a purchaser to receive a large quantity of poplar timber purchased warrants a recovery, where the purchaser had entire control of the market at the place of delivery, of the difference between the contract price of the timber at such place and the price of like timber in the nearest available market, less the additional cost of transporting such timber from such point to such available market. Yellow Poplar Lumber Co. v. Chapman, 20 C. C. A. 503, 42 U. S. App. 21, 74 Fed. 444.

And where logs being sent by the owner down a river to his mill are caught in the boom of another person part way down the river, and a part of them are converted to the use of the latter, who afterwards offers to pay for them, evidence as to the amount per thousand which it would cost to drive them from the place where they are caught to the owner's mill, and of the value per thousand at the latter place, is admissible on the question of damages. Saunders v. Clark, 106 Mass. 831.

So, where a contract for the purchase of a number of hogs was broken by refusal of the purchaser to be at the place of delivery and receive them, and there was no market value for hogs on the day and at the place of delivery, it is competent, in an action for the breach, to show their actual value at that time and place, and testimony as to the market price of hogs at other places in the vicinity of the place of delivery is proper and admissible to show the value of the hogs at the time and place of delivery. McCormick v. Hamilton, 23 Gratt. 561.

But where goods are sold, and the purchaser refuses to receive them, and there are two available markets, one of which is the controlling market for that locality for goods of that kind, and the other is not so extensive but nearer by, it is proper for the vendor to send the goods to the controlling market rather than the less extensive one, since a sale in that market would furnish better evidence of the value of the goods at the place of delivery than a sale in the other market. Anderson v. Frank, 45 Mo. App. 482.

IV. Determination as to existence or condition of market.

When, in case of a breach of a contract of sale, the article sold is one of ordinary merchandise, it may be presumed, in determining the damages caused by the breach, that it is purchasable at the market price. Stewart v. Power, 12 Kan. 596.

And a safe not made to order, and which is of the dimensions and quality of safes of that number and description, manufactured for the general trade, must be treated as ordinary merchandise in an action for breach of contract by refusal of a purchaser to receive it, so that the measure of damages would be the difference between the contract price and its market value at the time and place of delivery and the expense incurred in attempting to comply with the contract, and any additional cost for extra ornamentation, and not the difference between the contract price and the cost of production. Halliday v. Leah, 85 Mo. App. 285.

So, the rule that when a purchaser of an article which cannot be obtained in the general market sells to a third party at a profit, the profit is the measure of damage between the original buyer and seller, on a failure to deliver, cannot be applied when the goods are shown by testimony to be obtainable in the market and to have some market value at the place of delivery, or where the terms of the contract of resale are not disclosed with completeness. Low v. Craig, 8 Pa. Super. Ct. 622.

And where, in an action for breach of contract to furnish a quantity of ties, it appears that the number of ties not delivered could not have been purchased for immediate delivery in the market at the place where they were to be delivered on the day of delivery, that fact does not of itself establish the fact that there was no market price for such ties at such time and place. Jemmisson v. Gray, 29 Iowa, 537.

And where, in an action for breach of a contract for the sale and delivery of logs and lumber the court finds the value of the logs and lumber at the time and place of delivery, that value will be taken as the basis upon which damages are to be estimated, though there is evidence that that particular kind of lumber and logs had no particular market value and the value at the market where such lumber was usually sent for sale and the cost of transportation from the place of delivery is shown. Wape v. Ferguson (Ind.) 62 N. E. 712.

A merely nominal market price, however, furnishes no basis for ascertaining a purchaser's damage for breach of a contract of sale by the vendor. Cockburn v. Ashland Lumber Co. 54 Wis. 619, 12 N. W. 49.

And the breach of a contract to furnish oak lumber manufactured so as to be suitable for car construction purposes warrants the recovery of the difference between the cost of production and the contract price, though the lumber has a market value; as in such case the market value is not so general and certain as to furnish a true guide. Black River Lumber Co. v. Warner, 93 Mo. 374, 6 S. W. 210.

The stock in a bank with a capital limited by law to a certain amount is an article with restrictions on its production, for a breach of contract to deliver which the ordinary measure of damages for the conversion or refusal to deliver chattels of determinate value and unlimited production will not apply. In such case the vendee or person entitled to receive the stock must be placed in the same situation in which he would have been had he received the stock at the stipulated time, and should be allowed the difference between the consideration where it remained unpaid and the value of the stock, together with the difference between the interest on the consideration and the dividends on the stock. Bank of Montgomery v. Reese, 26 Pa. 143.

See also Todd v. Gamble, 148 N. Y. 382, 52 L. R. A. 225, 42 N. E. 982, supra, III. a.; McDonald v. Unaka Timber Co. 88 Tenn. 38, 12 S. W. 420, supra, II. b, 3.

To ascertain the existence of a market value for an article, however, for the purpose of determining the amount of damages to be awarded for a breach of contract of sale thereof, requires investigation of the actual condition of things, and does not warrant the consideration of the conjectural consequences of a state of things which did not exist. And an inquiry as to what effect the fulfillment of the contract in question involving a large transaction would have had on the market is too speculative to be permitted to affect the measure of damages for its breach.

Thus, an inquiry, in an action for breach of contract for the sale and delivery of a large quantity of madder by a refusal to deliver it, as to the market value of madder on the day when, by the contract, it should have been delivered in as large a quantity as that named in the contract, is not proper unless it is first shown that there was a market value for the article in such quantities. Dana v. Fiedler, 12 N. Y. 40, 62 Am. Dec. 130, 1 E. D. Smith, 463.

And an inquiry as to the difference between the price of madder on sales as large as 150 tons, and on sales of 2, 3, or 5 tons, is properly excluded in an action for refusal to deliver 150 tons of madder sold, where no facts appear warranting the supposition that the plaintiff could have procured the quantity which the defendant had agreed to deliver by a single purchase. Dana v. Fiedler, 12 N. Y. 40, 62 Am. Dec. 130.

And where the article sold consisted of 60,000 ties, the condition of the market and the scarcity or plenty in the market at the time of delivery, the demand and supply, and the actual state of the market, may be considered so far as they will aid in determining the market value of such ties at the time and place of delivery; but it is not proper to take into consideration what might have been the probable consequences resulting to the market had the purchaser gone into the market at the day of delivery to buy a large quantity of such ties to be delivered at once. Jemmisson v. Gray, 29 Iowa, 537.

V. Damages measured by profits lost.

See note, Loss of profits of sale or purchase as damages, to Guetzkow Brothers Co. v. A. H. Andrews & Co. (Wis.) 52 L. R. A. 209.

VI. Conclusion.

While damages for breach of a contract of sale or purchase are to be measured with reference to the market value of the thing sold whenever that is possible, the absence of a market in which it can be procured or sold does not defeat a recovery for the breach. The party injured is nevertheless entitled to reimbursement for the injury sustained, but the damages are to be measured by some other method.

This method depends upon the character of the thing purchased, the situation of the parties, and the purpose of the purchase, and is affected by all the varying circumstances of the cases in which the question arises.

As a general rule a total absence of any market in which the article in question could be either bought or sold warrants a recovery for breach of the contract of sale of the difference between the contract price and what it would cost the vendee to obtain it, though the reasonable value of the article is sometimes adopted as the measure when the cost of production cannot be accurately ascertained. If there is an available neighboring market, however, or if there was a market at some other not too remote time, that is to be resorted to, making allowance for cost of transportation or delay, in determining the measure of damages.

Where the article is purchased for a special purpose known to the vendor that purpose will generally control, a purchaser for the purpose of reselling being entitled, on breach by the vendor, to the difference between the contract price and the price to be obtained on the resale; and a purchaser for the purpose of using the article purchased being entitled to the difference between the contract price and what it would cost him to obtain it, or, if he could not obtain it, to the amount of loss suffered by him on the product of such intended use through failure to obtain it.

The vendee, however, must do all he can to avoid or reduce injury by way of trying to procure the thing purchased elsewhere, or to otherwise occupy himself or his machinery, or to procure an available substitute for that which he was to have; and while he is entitled to recover the necessary expense of so doing, he can only recover, in addition thereto, the difference between what he would have made had the article contracted for been supplied and what he was enabled to make without it.

When the breach is by the vendee the vendor is generally entitled to recover the difference between the contract price and the cost of manufacture or production where the breach occurred before the preparation of the article; if it occurred afterwards he is entitled, on surrender of the article or when it is useless in his hands, to the full contract price.

But he, too, must reduce damages as much as he can, and if a market at a place other than the place of delivery is available, or if he can otherwise dispose of the article sold, he can only recover the difference between the amount for which he could dispose of it and the contract price, together with the cost of transportation.

It would seem that to constitute an absence of market for an article within the meaning of the above rules there must have been an absence of any substantial market where such articles were bought and sold generally. A mere nominal market furnishes no basis for an estimate of damages for a breach of contract.

v.

Town of GREENVILLE, Appt.

(130 N. C. 93.)

The liability of a municipality to damages for permitting a drainage ditch to become obstructed and filled with filth and offal so that the water flows onto adjoining land and causes sickness in the family of its owner is limited to the injury to the property, and does not include the injury by sickness or death, nor by loss of time, increase of family expenses, nor by doctor's bills and medicines, resulting from the sickness.

(March 25, 1902.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pitt County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by the obstruction of a drain. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Jarvis & Blow and F. G. James, for appellant:

The law very largely regards surface water as a common enemy which every proprietor may fight or get rid of as best he may.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. ¶ 1039, p. 1318.

The municipality is not bound to protect from surface water those who may be so unfortunate as to own property below the level of the street; nor is the duty a perfect one to adopt a system or mode of drainage which will have this effect; and if one is adopted there is, in general, no liability except as to ministerial duties in connection therewith.

Id. ¶ 1042; Angell, Watercourses, 7th ed. p. 133; Gould, Waters, ed. 1883, §§ 269, 270, pp. 469, 470.

There is a broad distinction between one suing for injury to property or to person by some act of negligence of the municipality, and suing for alleged injury to health caused by the neglect of the city to observe some sanitary law with reference to its drainage system.

Hughes v. Auburn, 161 N. Y. 96, 46 L. R. A. 636, 55 N. E. 389.

Messrs. Skinner & Whedbee and A. M. Moore for appellee.

Furches, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is a resident and citizen of the town of Greenville and the defendant is a municipal corporation. The plaintiff is the owner of a house and lot in the defendant corporation, upon which he and family reside, and have done so for the last eight or ten years. The plaintiff alleges that it was the duty of the defendant to make such drains and sewers as were necessary to secure the health and comfort of all its inhabitants, but the defendant has utterly failed and neglected to perform and discharge its duty in this respect; that plaintiff's lot is situate on land much lower than that of a large portion of said town, and that defendant, before the plaintiff became the owner of his said lot, had cut an open ditch from the higher land through an adjacent lot into the street just below his lot, and made a culvert for the water to pass this street into a branch below, and the defendant had allowed this culvert to become so choked and out of repair that in time of heavy rains it would not carry the water that came down the ditch; that defendant had allowed the open ditch to become the depository of dead fowls and dead animals until it produced a stench, both disagreeable and unhealthy; that by reason of the improper construction of this ditch, and the obstruction to the flow of the water at the culvert, in times of heavy rains the water would overflow his entire lot; that this overflow water would at times remain upon his lot for a day or more, and when it would recede it would leave a scum upon his lot; that by reason of the negligence of the defendant—the overflow of this water—his home was made and became unhealthy, and two of his children became sick and died; that by reason of said sickness and deaths he suffered great pain and anguish of mind, that he lost much time in nursing them, that the expenses of his family were much increased, and he had large doctor's bills and drug bills to pay, to his damage $10,000. The defendant answered, denying the material allegations of the complaint, and denying its liability to the plaintiff for any damage. There was much evidence introduced by the plaintiff tending to sustain the allegations of fact in the complaint, and by the defendant to rebut the same. There were many prayers for special instructions on the part of the defendant, which we will NOTE.—For another case in this series denying the liability of a city for sickness and death resulting from negligent construction of sewer causing discharge of sewage in cellar, see Hughes v. Auburn (N. Y.) 46 L. R. A. 636.

As to liability of city for negligent construction of sewer generally, see Nashville v. Comer not state or consider here. The court submitted the following issues:

(1) Was the plaintiff damaged by the negligence of the town of Greenville in diverting water on his premises as alleged in the complaint?

A. Yes.

(2) If so, what is the amount of actual damage, outside of mental suffering, caused to him thereby?

A. $333.

(3) If so, what amount of damage did he sustain from mental suffering resulting directly from such negligence?

No answer.

The entire charge of the court is not sent up, and we take it there was no objection to that part. But from that sent up it appears that he charged the jury on the first issue as follows: "If the town ponded water from a natural water course by obstructing the course, then it is the same as if the water was diverted. The law draws a distinction between water within banks—a natural water course—and surface water. If the town diverted water, as I have indicated,—cut the ditch where there was no natural drain,—then it was its duty to keep the ditch clear." And upon the second issue he charged as follows: "This is the actual amount paid out on account of the sickness and his loss of time incident thereto. If you answer the first issue 'Yes,' you will assess, for your answer to the second issue, the amount in your judgment the plaintiff actually paid out by reason of such sickness, and what he lost from his work by reason of such sickness; and in this connection you will consider what he paid the doctor, if anything, what he spent for such articles as drugs, medicines, stimulants, and other things in the sickness growing out of these conditions over and above his usual cost of living." The defendant excepted. There was no evidence that there was a natural water course flowing by the plaintiff's lot, or where the old ditch was cut, though it was along or near the natural flow of the surface water. And while it was shown that there were dead fowls and animals in the old ditch, there was no evidence that the defendant put them there, or knew that they were there, until they were removed.

We will not set out the special prayers for instruction not given by the court, as we put our opinion upon what we understand to be the law of liability of a municipality in cases like this. We say "municipality," because we understand the rule of liability as to such corporations to be quite different from the liability of individuals or private corporations. In actions for damages against a municipal corporation, where the act complained of was done in pursuance of its legislative or judicial powers, or in the exercise of its authorized police powers, the doctrine of respondent superior does not apply, except as to property rights. And such defendant is only liable for injuries caused by neglect to perform some positive duty devolved upon it by reason of the incorporation,—such as keeping the public streets in repair, or damage to property, or when it receives a pecuniary benefit from it. The reason for this distinction, that it is liable for damage, seems to lie in the fact of ownership—vested rights—which no one has the right to invade, not even the government, unless it be for public purposes, and then only by paying the owner for it. This right to take property does not fall under the doctrine of police power, and the doctrine of respondent superior applies. This doctrine is sustained in the case of Hughes v. Auburn, 161 N. Y. 96, 46 L. R. A. 636, 55 N. E. 389. That case refers to Allen v. Boston, 159 Mass. 324, 34 N. E. 519, as not being in harmony with the doctrine held in Hughes v. Auburn. We have examined Allen v. Boston, and find expressions in the argument of the case that seem to be in conflict with the doctrine announced in Hughes v. Auburn and the principles announced by us in this case. But we find, upon examination, that the cases cited in Allen v. Boston are not authority for the statement that the plaintiff could recover for injury to his health, as against a municipality, for the reason that they were actions against private corporations which had no governmental or police powers, and where the doctrine of respondent superior applied. It seems to us that the learned court in Allen v. Boston lost sight of the governmental powers of the defendant and its right to exercise police powers, and that the doctrine of respondent superior did not prevail in that case. And we find the great weight of authority (indeed all we have been able to examine) sustains the views we have announced in this opinion, and none to the contrary,—unless it is Allen v. Boston. For the doctrine announced in this opinion, we cite 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 983, and the doctrine announced by this court in Mollenhenny v. Wilmington, 127 N. C. 146, 50 L. R. A. 470, 37 S. E. 187, and Peterson v. Wilmington, 130 N. C. 76, 56 L. R. A. 959, 40 S. E. 853; as to the right of the defendant to make the ditch, and its liability for the overflow of the water, we cite Gould, Waters, ed. 1883, §§ 269, 270; and as to police powers, Dill. Mun. Corp. § 141.

We are therefore of the opinion that the defendant may be held to answer in damages as for a trespass for any damages the plaintiff may have sustained to his property by reason of the wrongful action of the defendant, but not for any sickness that may have been caused to him or his family; nor can he recover damage for his time, the increase in expenses of his family, nor for doctor's bills or medicines that may have been caused by such sickness. And, as his honor instructed the jury that they should "assess" the defendant for the loss of time, the increased expenses of the family, the doctor's bills and medicines, which it seems from the findings of the jury were the only things upon which the jury based the verdict, there was error.

While the announcements in this opinion involve no new doctrine, we consider it an important decision, as it is probably the first time this doctrine has been so distinctly announced by this court.

We have examined the authorities cited for the plaintiff, and fail to see that they are in conflict with this opinion. They are cases between individuals, or against private corporations, where governmental rights and the doctrine of police power are not involved, which distinguishes them from this case.

Error. New trial.

Douglas, J., dissenting:

I must confess my inability to appreciate the distinctions drawn by the court. It is admitted that the plaintiff can recover for any damage done to his property, and it is difficult to imagine a much greater injury to a man's home than rendering it uninhabitable. I can readily see that it is not practical to award damages to the entire community for injuries to health, for two reasons: (1) The extreme difficulty of measuring such damages, and (2) because of the imminent danger of bankrupting the town. The latter is apparently the basic reason in Hughes v. Auburn, 161 N. Y. 96, 46 L. R. A. 636, 55 N. E. 389, the case relied upon by this court, and the only case cited tending to sustain its opinion. Even that case, decided by a divided court, gives, as one of its reasons, that the plaintiff's interest was not the owner of the property. In Allen v. Boston, 159 Mass. 324, 337, 34 N. E. 519, 520, the court says: "The defendant also argues that the only damage the plaintiff can recover, if any, would be the injury to his property, and that injury to his health or business was wrongly allowed to be included in the damages. Such damages were specially alleged, and are clearly recoverable." In the case at bar the damages are suffered by the owner of the property, are specially alleged and found, and can be easily and definitely computed, being the actual money paid out and the value of his time lost on account of the negligence of the defendant. This is clearly stated in his honor's charge. The opinion of the court also cites Dill. Mun. Corp. § 983. That section is not the one that applies to the case at bar. In § 980, which does apply, the learned author says: "For illustration, if a city neglects its ministerial duty to cause its sewers to be kept free from obstructions, to the injury of a person who has an interest in the performance of that duty, it is liable, as we shall see, to an action for the damages thereby occasioned." The italics are those of the author. The cases of McIlhenny v. Wilmington, 127 N. C. 146, 50 L. R. A. 470, 37 S. E. 187, relating to the misconduct of a policeman, and Peterson v. Wilmington, 130 N. C. 76, 40 S. E. 853, referring to the fire department, are equally devoid of application to the case at bar. In this case the injury was apparently caused by the active negligence of the defendant's officers and agents in diverting water by means of a ditch, and then permitting this ditch to be obstructed, not only with sand, but with "dead cats, chickens, pigs, and other dead animals." This seems to me gross negligence which is clearly actionable. It is true the town authorities might be indicted either as at common law, for maintaining a public nuisance, or for neglect of duty under the Code. State v. Hawkins, 77 N. C. 494; State v. Hatch, 116 N. C. 1003, 21 S. E. 430; State v. Dickson, 124 N. C. 871, 32 S. E. 961. But there are very few private citizens, and especially those dependent upon their daily labor, willing to undergo the trouble, expense, and possible danger of antagonizing the governing body of a municipality. Moreover, such a course, while perhaps beneficial to the community, would not afford any personal compensation for the injuries received. As I see no error in the trial of the case, I must dissent from the opinion of the court.

v.

Christopher C. CUTLER et al.

(130 N. C. 1.)

1. Revocation of a will may be effected by adopting its mutilation by vermin as such.
2. When a will produced from the testator's custody is mutilated and the signature destroyed the burden is on proponents to account for the mutilation, and not on the caveators to show that the mutilation was purposely done.
3. An admission as to what an absent witness will testify to, made for the purpose of securing a speedy trial, is not admissible at a subsequent term when the presence of the witness has been secured.
4. A will is not void because the witnesses signed before the testator, if all parties were present at the time of the execution and the signatures were affixed by each in the presence of the others.

(February 18, 1902.)

APPEAL by contestant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Beaufort County in favor of proponents in an action to determine the validity of an alleged will of Nathan C. Cutler, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles F. Warren, for appellant:

The sequence and order of the acts necessary to make an attested will are: (1) That it shall be written in the testator's lifetime; (2) signed by him, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction; and (3) subscribed in his presence by two witnesses at least, no one of whom shall be interested in the devise or bequest.

of the said estate, except as hereinafter provided.

N. C. Code, § 2136.

The signature by witnesses before the testator is not sufficient.

If the will was properly executed then it was afterwards revoked.

Bennett v. Sherrod, 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 303, 40 Am. Dec. 410.

The will appeared to be mutilated by vermin, and the signature of the testator appeared to have been torn from the will. If torn, the slightest act of tearing, if done by the testator with the intention of revoking his will, amounts to a revocation.

White v. Casten, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 197; 1 Jarman, Wills, 286; 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 270.

If the mutilation was done entirely by vermin, still the testator could adopt and ratify such mutilation or destruction, and it would amount to a revocation of his will.

Messrs. Small & McLean and B. B. Nicholson for appellees.

Furches, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of devisavit vel non of the will of Nathan C. Cutler. It is not contended but what he at one time intended the paper writing offered for probate as his last will and testament; and while there are other exceptions to other matters, which will be considered, the principal question is as to whether it was revoked or not, and, as this is the main question, we will assume that it was properly executed, and consider the question of revocation first. There was a motion to nonsuit the plaintiff at the close of the evidence, and the whole evidence is sent up as a part of the case on appeal, including the script offered as the will, and the clerk is instructed in the case on appeal to attach and send this as a part of the record evidence in the case. This script is therefore legitimately before us as a part of the evidence, to be considered for whatever it may be worth. The script was written, and, we will say, executed some ten years or more before the death of Cutler, and, his children all having married and left him, he abandoned his home with the purpose of living among his children; and, without moving his household furniture, a few months before he died he rented to one James Asbury, who moved into his dwelling house. Asbury, according to his evidence, found this script in an unsealed envelope in an unlocked drawer of an old safe belonging to the testator, left by him in said house, in which there were other papers. He said nothing to the testator about finding the will. The will had been seen by others who had been using the house for the purpose of storing grain, before the death of the testator, but they had not mentioned it to him. The script, as it comes to us, is badly mutilated. The name of the testator, if it was ever there,—and we take it that it was,—is entirely gone; and it is badly mutilated in other respects. Much of the work of mutilation was the work of moths or vermin, and it is contended by the propounders that it was all done by them. But it looks to us as if it had been torn where the signature of the testator should have been. These were all matters for the jury upon the evidence and proper instructions from the court. The paper itself showed the mutilations, and, as there was much evidence tending to show that the testator knew of the defaced condition of this paper long before his death, it was contended by the caveator that, if he did not tear the paper himself, there is abundant evidence showing that he accepted it as a destruction of his will, and that he intended to die intestate. And while it was not denied that there was evidence tending to show this to be the fact, the propounders contended that, unless the script had been defaced by the maker, or by someone for him in his presence and by his direction, the will was not revoked; that he could not ratify the obliteration or destruction of the will by the vermin if he wished to do so; that a will properly executed could only be revoked in the manner above stated or by making another will; and his honor, being of the opinion that the law was as contended by the propounders, so instructed the jury in substance. In this, we think, there was error. Revocation consists of two things,—the intention of the testator, and some outward act or symbol of destruction. A defacement, obliteration, or destruction, without the animo revocandi, is not sufficient. Neither is the intention—the animo revocandi—sufficient, without some act of obliteration or destruction is done. It seems to us that the court placed too strict a construction upon the statute. The will was in the possession of the testator, and it seems from the evidence that he knew of the obliteration, if he did not himself tear his name off the paper. He must have gotten this information by handling and inspecting the same, and, if so, it was done in his presence, or it was done and in his presence. And if he then had the animo revocandi, why was not this a compliance with the statute, and a revocation? We find it stated in Pritchard, Wills & Administration, § 267, that "every act of canceling . . . imports prima facie that it is done animo revocandi, . . . yet it is but a presumption, which may be repelled by accompanying [or subsequent] circumstances." And we find that this quotation is taken from the opinion of the court by Ruffin, Ch. J., in Bethell v. Moore, 19 N. C. (2 Dev. & B. L.) 311. We also see in Pritchard, Wills & Administration, § 269, the following: "But it has been held that the failure of the testator, after being informed of the loss or destruction of his will, to execute another, when he has time and opportunity to do so, furnishes a presumption of intention to revoke the lost or destroyed will; but this presumption may be rebutted or explained away by proof of the declarations of the testator or other evidence." We find these views expressly stated in Steele v. Price, 5 B. Mon. 58. We are therefore led to the conclusion that, if the obliteration was entirely by vermin, the question of revocation animo revocandi should have been left to the jury to say, from all the evidence, whether Nathan C. Cutler intended said script to remain his will or not; and it was error in the court to take this question from the jury, and to instruct them in effect that, if this was so, it did not amount to a revocation of the will.

The court also instructed the jury that if the testator found the will in its mutilated condition, and, thinking that this was in law a revocation, and for that reason he said he had thrown it away or destroyed it, that would not amount to a revocation. The language of the witness Respass is that Cutler told him that he had destroyed the will. The language of the witness John B. Respass is as follows "I said to him: 'Your business is all fixed. I wrote your will.' He said: 'No; the will you wrote for me I have destroyed. There were such changes in my property that the will would not fit any way.'" He said nothing about his "opinion of the law," but simply, "I have destroyed" it. But we are unable to see what effect his opinion of the law would have had on the case if he had destroyed it. The question for the jury upon this evidence was, Had he destroyed it? Had he purposely torn his name from the will, and thereby destroyed it? If he had, it was no longer his will. But the court instructed the jury that, "if the jury should find that the will was properly executed by Nathan C. Cutler, then the burden of proof shifted to the caveators to show by the greater weight of the evidence that the will had been revoked." This was error. If there had been no evidence of erasure or destruction on the script itself,—if the paper had been perfect,—this charge would have been correct. But, where the name of the testator was gone,—torn off by the testator, as the caveator alleges, or destroyed by moths as the propounder contends,—the propounders did not establish it as the will of Nathan C. Cutler by proving that it was originally executed by him. This would not have been so in an action on a note or bond, and is not in this case. And the burden of proof did not change to the caveators at this stage, and place the burden upon them to explain and show how the testator's name came to be off the paper. The will had been in the possession of Cutler. When produced, it had upon it these marks of mutilation, the testator's name being gone. It devolved upon the propounders to account for this, and it was not Cutler's will until they did so to the satisfaction of the jury. When the will was produced without the name of Nathan C. Cutler, this was prima facie evidence of a revocation, and the law presumed that it had been revoked.

It is true this presumption might be repelled, but the burden of doing so was on the propounders. If this was not so, it would be to require the caveator to rebut the presumption that was in his favor. Bethell v. Moore, 19 N. C. (2 Dev. & B. L.) 311; Steele v. Price, 5 B. Mon. 58; Pritchard, Wills & Administration, §§ 267, 269; Underhill, Wills, § 225; Theobald, Wills, p. 45. There was error in this instruction.

Upon the trial of this case at July term, 1901, the propounders offered the following admission as a part of their evidence: "In the trial of this action the caveator, Samuel A. Cutler, admits the following facts: That John B. Respass, in the presence of the alleged testator, Nathan C. Cutler, signed the script propounded as his will as a subscribing witness thereto, at the request and in the presence of the said Nathan C. Cutler, who also signed it in the presence of the said witness, and declared it to be his last will." The caveator objected to this evidence, and C. F. Warren, Esq., made affidavit that he was the attorney of the caveator at February term, 1898; that when the case was called at that term the caveator announced his readiness for trial, and the propounders stated they were not ready for trial for the want of the testimony of John B. Respass, a subscribing witness to the will; when the caveator, for the purpose of getting a trial at that term, made the admission simply because the witness Respass was absent; that at that term the caveator did not know that said Respass knew any other facts material to the execution or revocation of the will; that before the case was called for trial at this term he, as the attorney of the caveator, had notified one of the attorneys for the propounders that Respass was then present, attending court as a witness, and that he should object to the introduction of said admission in evidence. This testimony of Mr. Warren was not disputed by the other side. But the court admitted this admission as evidence, and the caveator excepted. In this, we think, there was error. It is not like a solemn admission of a fact in an answer, or otherwise, where it is intended by the parties to be permanent, and in this respect differs from Guy v. Manuel, 89 N. C. 83. In this case it was made on account of the absence of Respass. At this trial Respass was present, and the reason for making it ceased, and the propounders were notified of the fact of his presence, and that its admission would be objected to. As the reason ceased, the admission should have ceased. The propounders lost nothing they had before the admission was made. But the admission itself says "in the trial of this action." The admission is in the singular,—in the trial,—and it was used in that trial. The point presented is a singular one, and we have found nothing like it in the practice, and have put what we think is a just construction upon it, and do not think it should have been admitted.

There is one other question presented by the record that should be passed upon, and that is this: It seems that the witnesses signed the will before the testator, Cutler. But it was all done at the same time, and in the presence of each other; the witnesses seeing the testator's presence, and the testator seeing the witnesses' presence. It therefore differs from Re Cox, 46 N. C. (1 Jones L.) 321, where the witness signed the will at home, and not in the presence of the testator. In that case it was held to be an insufficient execution of the will; but it is there intimated that, had the witness signed in the presence of the testator, though before the testator, it would have been sufficient. It seems singular that the witnesses should have signed before the testator, as there was nothing at that time for them to attest. It was certainly awkward and illogical for them to do so, and can only be sustained by its being all a part of one and the same transaction. This exception of the caveator is not sustained, and there was no error in the ruling of the court upon this exception.

But for the errors pointed out in the opinion, there must be a new trial.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

T. T. CHARLES et al.

(.....Ala.)

1. A note given to reimburse a surety on a fidelity bond for what it has been compelled to pay because of the principal's embezzlement, on condition that the surety would not prosecute the principal for the defalcation, is void.
2. The proper measure of proof necessary to a verdict in civil cases is such as will reasonably satisfy the jury.
3. A jury is not bound to adopt the construction of a contract which will render it legal if it is equally capable of one which will render it illegal if other evidence in the case tends to show illegality.

(December 18, 1901.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Montgomery City Court in favor of defendants in an action brought to enforce certain promissory notes. Affirmed.

Plaintiff was surety for F. W. Caldwell, who was bookkeeper of the Standard Building & Loan Association. He was charged with embezzlement, and plaintiff as his surety paid the amount which it was claimed that he had embezzled. It thereupon took a note, with sureties, for the amount which it had paid, to enforce payment of which this action was brought.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Marks & Sayre for appellant.

Mr. Ray Rushton, for appellees:

Any contract, the consideration of which, or any part thereof, is an agreement to compound a felony, is illegal, and when the parties stand in pari delicto the law will not entertain any action in respect thereto, but leaves the parties where it finds them.

Contracts which are entire are not enforceable if any part of the transaction is illegal. Where the contract is divisible the part which is legal will be enforced notwithstanding the illegal part. The contract here is the note sued on, which is tainted with illegality, and, as it cannot be divided up, the court will not enforce any part of it.

Dowdell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first and third pleas, to which demurrers were interposed by plaintiff and overruled by the court, set up the illegality of the consideration of the notes sued on. These pleas aver that the notes were given in consideration of an agreement and promise made by the payee not to prosecute the principal maker of said notes, viz., one Caldwell, for the embezzlement by him of $650 from the Standard Building & Loan Association of Montgomery, Alabama, in the employment of which company he was engaged as a bookkeeper. It is further shown by said pleas that the payee guaranty company was security upon the employment bond of said Caldwell at the time of said embezzlement by him, and as such surety paid to said building and loan association the said sum so embezzled. That there was an implied contract, under the law, on the part of Caldwell, to pay to the said guaranty company the amount so paid by it to the building and loan association for his said default, there can be no doubt, and that upon such implied contract a right of action existed and a recovery could be had by the guaranty company against said Caldwell is equally clear, but that is not the contract here sued upon. The contract sued upon is an express contract made by said Caldwell, together with the defendants as his sureties, which is based upon a consideration which is, at least in part, illegal. It is contended by counsel for appellant that the only difference between the contract implied by law and the express contract sued upon is one of evidence. In this contention appellant's counsel is mistaken. The express contract, besides carrying with it the obligation of the defendants as sureties, also provides for a waiver of exemptions, neither of which existed in the implied contract. The plaintiff, in his action, relies wholly upon the express contract, and upon it he must stand or fall, without any regard to the implied contract which the law raised up between plaintiff and the principal debtor out of the circumstances of the default and embezzlement. It is a well-settled principle of law that a consideration in part illegal will avoid the entire contract. 1 Brickell's Dig. p. 382, § 116, and cases there cited. The fact that there was a contractual relation existing between Caldwell and the guaranty company, by virtue of the latter's suretyship upon a bond for the faithful performance of duty by Caldwell to his employer, the Standard Building & Loan Association, cannot vary the principle laid down in the authorities above cited, or purge the contract of the illegality of consideration. When the guaranty company paid the amount of the default to the loan company, it then occupied the same relation to the embezzler, as to an implied promise by him to refund, as existed between the embezzler and the loan company, from whom he embezzled the funds, before said guaranty company settled the defalcation. It is the promise, as an inducement to the contract sued upon, that the payee will abstain from criminal prosecution of the principal maker, that taints the consideration of the note; being opposed to public policy and offensive to the law. Moog v. Strung, 69 Ala. 98; Wynne v. Whisenant, 37 Ala. 46; Milton v. Haden, 32 Ala. 30, 70 Am. Dec. 523. The case of Bibb v. Hitchcock, 49 Ala. 468, 20 Am. Rep. 288, is cited as an authority in support of the appellant's contention here, and as being directly in point. The facts in that case are not the same as the facts here, but in so far as any principle of law there stated, bearing upon the question here under consideration, is opposed to the views expressed by us above, we decline to follow it. Moreover, it may be suggested that what was said in Bibb v. Hitchcock relating to the consideration of the contract was unnecessary to the decision of that case, as the court very properly, for other reason there stated, held the bill to be without equity.

It has been several times decided by this court that the proper measure of proof necessary to a verdict in civil cases is that the jury shall be reasonably satisfied from the evidence. Charge No. 1 requested by the plaintiff was, in its tendency, misleading, in that it was calculated to impress upon the jury that a greater measure of proof was necessary than that laid down in the above rule. Charge No. 3 requested by the plaintiff, and which was refused, was likewise calculated to mislead. Besides, it excluded from consideration by the jury all the evidence in the case except that of the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant. Although the agreement, if taken alone, should be equally capable of two constructions, one legal and the other criminal, the jury would not be bound, under the law, to adopt the former rather than the latter construction if other evidence in the case tended to show illegality in said agreement.

There appearing no error in the rulings of the court, the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

(135 Cal. 662.)

1. Insufficient finding upon certain issues in the case does not require reversal unless the finding of those issues in favor of appellant would entitle him to a judgment.
2. The cost of a street improvement cannot be assessed on abutting property where the contractor is required by the ordinance to sustain all loss or damage arising from the nature of the work to be done under the specifications.

Chipman, C., filed the following opinion:

Defendant became the purchaser of certain lots belonging to plaintiff, in the city of Coronado, at a sale for nonpayment of interest on a bond issued to a contractor to represent the assessment against plaintiff's said lots for street work. The action is to restrain defendant from applying for a deed and to quiet plaintiff's title as against said sale. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

The controversy grows out of the improvement of Orange avenue in said city, which improvement was made under the street improvement act of March 18, 1885, as amended in 1891 (Stat. 1891, p. 116). 57 L. R. A.

Appellant contends that there are no sufficient findings upon certain issues, namely:

(1) That no plans or specifications for said work were ever adopted; (2) that no bond was ever given by the contractors for the performance of their contract; (3) that Orange avenue has never been dedicated or accepted as a public highway. The court found that no plans for doing the work were ever adopted by the board prior to the passage of ordinance No. 39, and that it never adopted any specifications other than such as are contained in said ordinance and in the resolution of intention and the resolution ordering the work; and that no plans for doing said work were ever adopted by the board after the passage of said ordinance No. 39. The ordinance is set out in its entirety. The resolution of intention is fully set forth elsewhere in the findings, and the pleadings admit that there was a resolution ordering the work. As to the bond the finding is that "a bond purporting to be given as and for a bond for doing said work, by said contractors, for the performance of said contract, is in the words and figures following [then follows the bond]: that no other or different bond was ever given for said purpose." As to the dedication of Orange avenue the findings set forth all the facts connected with the attempted dedication, which included the map filed by the Coronado Beach Company, owners of the land over which the avenue ran; also a deed of dedication, duly recorded, with certain reservations. The rule is that, if all material issues are not found upon, a reversal will not be ordered unless the findings on those issues in favor of appellant would entitle him to a judgment. Morrison v. Stone, 103 Cal. 94, 37 Pac. 142; Gould v. Adams, 108 Cal. 365, 41 Pac. 408. If any one of the alleged defects in the proceedings is sufficient to support the judgment, the failure to find upon others is immaterial, and not ground for reversal. Adams v. Helbing, 107 Cal. 298, 40 Pac. 422. We think, however, that the probative facts are found from which the ultimate facts may be inferred or conclusions of law may be drawn.

In his complaint plaintiff sets forth several objections going to the validity of the assessment, some of which present important questions. The view we feel constrained to take on one of these objections renders it unnecessary to pass upon the others. The ordinance which authorized the work, and which became a part of the contract, inasmuch as the specifications adopted are to be there found, contained the following provisions: "The contractor shall keep good and sufficient guards around said improvements, by fence or otherwise, to prevent accident, and shall hang thereon lights, to burn from dusk until daylight; and the contractor shall hold the city harmless for any and all suits for damages, arising out of the construction of said improvements. The contractor shall, when required to do so by the superintendent of streets, remove from the work any overseer, laborer, or other person, who shall refuse or neglect to obey the said superintendent in anything relating to the work, or who shall perform his work in a manner contrary to these specifications or be found incompetent or unfaithful. All loss or damage arising from the nature of the work to be done under these specifications shall be sustained by the contractor." It may be that a fair construction of these provisions, except as to those in italics, would warrant our holding them to relate to damage during the progress of the work and before the city had accepted it; that the city was to be held harmless merely as to damages resulting from negligence or carelessness of the contractor in prosecuting the work which it was his duty and within his power to avoid. But as to the clause in italics it seems to us the purpose had a broader meaning, and looked to damage which might arise out of and subsequent to the completed work,—practically any damage for which the city would be liable which might originate in "the nature of the work to be done." The reasoning in Brown v. Jenks, 98 Cal. 10, 32 Pac. 701, and Alameda Macadamizing Co. v. Pringle, 130 Cal. 226, 52 L. R. A. 264, 62 Pac. 394, seems to apply with equal force here. The contractor in the first of these cases was to keep the street in repair for five years, and in the second case cited he was to guarantee the work for one year "from injury by ordinary use." The point decided was that the provision was not only unauthorized by the statute, but that it changed and might increase the burden of the property owner, for the reason that the contractor could not afford to do the work in the one case or give the guaranty in the other for nothing. "The contractor," it was said, "would charge a higher price for the work when he was forced to contract also for repairs." No one can say that a contractor would agree to stand behind the city, and hold it harmless from damage arising out of the work he had undertaken to do, without some compensation additional to the necessary cost of the material and labor to him, plus a reasonable profit. In thus agreeing he might subject himself to liabilities much greater than the cost of protecting the work, for one year, "from injury by ordinary use," or greater, even, than the cost of keeping "the street in repair for the period of five years." It was said in Brown v. Jenks, 98 Cal. 10, 32 Pac. 701: "Officers are provided and vested with the power and charged with the duty of seeing that such work is properly done. A bond cannot be substituted for the performance of this duty." The law does not authorize a municipality to escape its liability by shifting it to the shoulders of the contractor, and in attempting to do so it imposed conditions that would naturally tend to increase the cost of the work.

The judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: Haynes, C.; Gray, C.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

P. H. FLOOD, Appt.

(135 Cal. 458.)

1. Damages for the death of the child cannot be allowed in an action by husband and wife for a physician's abandonment of the wife during her confinement.
2. A verdict for an entire sum to be awarded to a man and wife for injury to her by a physician's abandonment of her during confinement will be set aside if the court's instructions authorized a consideration of the fact of the child's death in fixing the damages.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have resulted to the female plaintiff because of the negligent and unskillful treatment of her by defendant. Reversed.

An opinion was handed down in this case in Department 2, on February 20, 1901, in which the judgment of the lower court was affirmed, but a rehearing was granted before the court in banc and the department opinion superseded by the one published below, and the former opinion is therefore omitted.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Garret W. McEnerney, for appellant:

The plaintiff in an action against a physician for malpractice must not only show want of proper skill, care, or diligence on the part of the defendant in the treatment of his patient, but he or she must also show that injuries were sustained by the plaintiff as the direct result of such want of skill, care, or diligence.

Mr. William S. Barnes also for respondents.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs are husband and wife, and seek hereby to recover damages from the defendant for injuries sustained by the plaintiff Margaret by reason of the acts and conduct of the defendant towards her at the time of her confinement. The defendant is a physician, and had been engaged by the wife to attend her upon that occasion. Upon being summoned to her residence therefor, he found the case to be somewhat complicated, and that it would be necessary to make use of instruments for the purpose of removing the child from the mother. Upon inserting the instruments for this purpose, the mother cried out from the pain caused thereby, and shrank or pulled herself away, so that the instruments came out. Upon inserting them again she again screamed and shrank away, whereupon the defendant said: "You quit your screaming. If you don't quit, I'll quit." She again screamed, and the instruments again came out; and the defendant thereupon wrapped up his instruments, saying, "I am going to quit," put on his overcoat, and left the room, without giving any directions to the wife or to the nurse who was with her, or saying anything further. After he had left the house the husband followed him and asked him to return, but, with considerable rudeness, he refused. In about an hour another physician was obtained, by whose aid the child was delivered. This physician was also compelled to make use of instruments for its delivery, and when the child was delivered it had certain marks or bruises upon its head, and lived only about fifteen minutes after its birth. In the complaint herein, after setting forth the foregoing facts, and alleging that the death of the child resulted from the said unskillful and negligent conduct of the defendant, the plaintiffs allege "that, by reason of the several premises, plaintiff Margaret A. Lathrope was injured in her health and constitution, and was weakened in body, and said plaintiff suffered great pain and mental anguish to the damage and detriment of plaintiffs in the sum of $10,000." The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict of $2,000 was rendered against the defendant. From the judgment entered thereon, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed, and in support of his appeal contends that the court erred in giving to the jury certain instructions in regard to the damages which they might award. Upon this subject the court gave the following instruction: "In assessing damages the jury may also consider what, if any, connection defendant's conduct had with the death of the child of plaintiffs,—that being made an issue in this case; and if you believe from the evidence in the case that defendant's acts or omissions heretofore mentioned were the direct, proximate cause of the death of plaintiff's child, then you may consider this in assessing damages. Compensatory damages for the death of a minor child include damages for the pecuniary loss proximately resulting from the death, but do not include damages for mental suffering from bereavement." The complaint does not charge any negligent or unskillful conduct on the part of the defendant in his treatment of the plaintiff Margaret prior to his abandonment of the case, nor was there any evidence at the trial that so long as he remained with her he was in any respect negligent or unskillful. The only ground of recovery against the defendant charged in the complaint is for the injury sustained by the wife in health and constitution, and for the pain and mental anguish suffered by her. No claim is made in the complaint, nor was there any evidence at the trial, of any damage sustained by reason of the death of the child, and the jury were instructed that they could not award damages for mental suffering arising from bereavement. Moreover, there was no evidence before the jury from which they could find that the death of the child was caused by negligence or want of skill on the part of the defendant in his efforts to effect its delivery. A claim for damages by reason of the death of the child should have been specially pleaded, and the right to recover such damages was in the husband alone. If such claim had been set forth in the complaint herein, the complaint would have been subject to demurrer for a misjoinder of parties plaintiff, as well as for misjoinder of causes of action. The case before the court did not, therefore, authorize any recovery for damages arising from the death of the child; and it was error for the court to instruct the jury that in assessing damages they could consider whether the defendant's conduct had any connection with its death, and could also consider his acts and omissions in causing its death. Such instruction was foreign to any issue in the case, and was misleading, and tended to divert the jury from a consideration of the only questions proper to be submitted to them. Whitman v. Steiger, 46 Cal. 256; Hanks v. Naglee, 54 Cal. 51, 35 Am. Rep. 67.

As the verdict is for an entire sum, and does not specify the amounts of the several items of damage which the court instructed the jury that it might consider in making up its verdict, it is impossible to determine the amount which would have been awarded in the absence of such instruction, and the verdict should therefore have been set aside.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

Matthew COLWELL
v.
City of WATERBURY, Appt.

(.....Conn.....)

1. The operation of a stone crushing machine to prepare material for constructing and repairing its highways is a governmental act of a municipality, so that it will be exempt from liability for injury to an employee through a defect in the machine, although the machine is located several miles from the place where the material is to be used.
2. That a part of the expense of a street improvement is to be paid by assessment upon property benefited does not make the duty of making it any less a governmental duty, within the rule exempting the municipality from liability for injuries caused by its performance, than if the entire expense were to be paid by general city tax.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Hall, J.:

The complaint alleged that defendant was the owner of a stone crusher used to crush stone for macadamizing the streets of the city of Waterbury, and that defendant also sold stone crushed by such crusher at a profit; that on the 12th of July, 1894, plaintiff was in the employ of the defendant, feeding stone into said crusher, when, by reason of a broken tooth in said crusher, and of the want of a proper covering for said crusher, which defects were known to the defendant's superintendent and foreman in charge of said machine, the latter of whom had promised the plaintiff that new teeth and a proper covering would be furnished for said machine, so as to make it safe, the plaintiff was injured by a stone thrown by said machine while he was feeding the same, which struck him in the right eye and wholly destroyed the sight thereof. As a second defense, the defendant alleged that at the time of the accident it was engaged in the performance of a public duty imposed upon it by statute, in repairing certain highways within its limits by macadamizing them, which work was being done in accordance with the provisions of its charter under the superintendence of the street inspector, who had employed a foreman to take charge of the stone crusher and the crushing of the stone, which foreman, with authority from said inspector, had employed the plaintiff, who, at the time of the accident, was actually employed at such work in the town of Cheshire. The court having overruled the plaintiff's demurrer to this answer, these allegations were denied by the plaintiff's reply. Upon the trial it appeared that the stone crusher by reason of a defect in which the plaintiff was injured was owned by the defendant, and at the time of the accident was being used by the defendant in the town of Cheshire, 10 miles from Waterbury, in crushing stone to be transported by rail to Waterbury and by teams to a street which was being macadamized, and there used in macadamizing said street. The plaintiff, it appeared, was employed by the defendant's street inspector, called "Superintendent of Streets," who had the general superintendence of this work and the care and maintenance of streets, and was put to work on the stone crusher by the foreman, who, subject to the superintendent, had charge of the work of stone-crushing at Cheshire, and at the time he was injured was so employed in the work of crushing stone which the defendant intended to use, and did use, in the macadamizing of one of its streets. There seems to have been no evidence that the defendant, prior to the accident, ever sold the stone crushed by said machine, or used them for any other purpose than in macadamizing its streets. The defendant, in substance, requested the court to charge the jury that the city of Waterbury could not be held liable, by reason of any negligence on the part of its officers or servants who were in charge of the work of crushing the stone for the purpose of repairing its streets, because in doing said work the defendant was performing a public governmental duty imposed upon it by the state. The court charged the jury, in part, that the care and maintenance of its streets by the defendant was a governmental duty, and that, if the preparation of the stone used in the repair of the street was work done in the performance of such governmental duty, there could be no recovery; that "the crushing of stone intended to be used and subsequently used in macadamizing a street 10 miles away was not work done in the care and maintenance of the street. Such work is confined to the work done on the street itself, or in bringing to the street the necessary materials and instrumentalities used in the work; it has no relation to the manufacture of material or instrumentality, or the use of machinery for that purpose." It is provided by an act of legislature, made a public act, that the city of Waterbury shall be a highway district; that its court of common council shall have the sole and exclusive authority and control over all streets within the limits of the city, and the sole and exclusive power to lay out and make new streets, and to alter and repair streets, and the like power to order the paving, macadamizing, or otherwise improving any street or highway within the city, and that said court of common council, upon the execution of any order for the paving, macadamizing, or otherwise improving any such street, may assess a reasonable part of the expense thereof upon the persons whose property is especially benefited thereby. The act further provides for the appointment by the board of aldermen and the court of common council of a board of street commissioners, who are to have the general superintendence and control over the streets, and to cause the same to be kept in good condition and repair, and to execute all orders of said court in reference to the streets, etc., and who are empowered to employ, in the name and behalf of the city, a street inspector, a street surveyor, and such other persons as may be necessary for the performance of the duties imposed upon said board. 7 Special Laws, pp. 217-219.

Mr. Lucien F. Burpee, with Mr. John P. Kellogg, for appellant:

The manner in which the city shall proceed to obtain material necessary for the repair of its streets has not been specifically imposed upon it; that is, the law does not specifically impose upon the city the duty of crushing stone and using it for such purpose.

The decision of such questions has always been left to the discretion of the municipal authorities, and their determination is not to be interfered with by the courts, which have no jurisdiction to supervise or revise the act of municipal governing bodies, except for fraud or corruption, or similar serious cause.

Whitney v. New Haven, 58 Conn. 450, 20 Atl. 666.

The city, in providing for the maintenance of its streets, ought to consider which method will be most "convenient and economical," both to itself as a corporation and to the general public. In the absence of fraud the courts will not interfere.

Dibble v. New Haven, 56 Conn. 199, 14 Atl. 210.

The municipality is always exempt from liability in regard to any administrative matter, when the matter is connected with the performance of a governmental duty for the benefit of the public.

Jewett v. New Haven, 38 Conn. 389, 9 Am. Rep. 382; Daly v. New Haven, 69 Conn. 644, 38 Atl. 397.

The injury complained of in this case was occasioned by the negligence of the officers and servants of the defendant in caring for and maintaining the stone crusher which was used to prepare the stone required for the care and maintenance of the streets. Being admittedly engaged in the performance of a governmental duty while it was caring for and maintaining its streets, and having undoubtedly the exclusive power to determine that it would perform that duty by covering the streets with crushed stone, and that it would use its own stone crusher for that purpose, it cannot be held liable for any accident occasioned by any neglect to properly care for the stone crusher.

In the absence of express statute therefor, municipal corporations are not more liable to action for injuries occasioned by reason of negligence in using or keeping in repair the fire engines owned by them, than in the case of a town house or public way.

Municipal corporations are responsible in damages for all injuries occasioned by their negligence in the management or care of public property, irrespective of the question whether an income is derived from it.

There is a very clear distinction which is to be borne in mind in cases where governmental duties are imposed upon public officers, and where towns are authorized by the legislature to do the same duties. In the latter class of cases, the duty is imposed upon the town doing the work in question, and the town in town meeting, or by its selectmen, takes the entire charge of the work, selects its own agents, and does the work in the time and in the manner it 57 L. pleases. In such a case the negligence of the servant is the negligence of the town, and the rule respondet superior applies.

Hall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The injury to the plaintiff was caused by the operating of a defective stone crusher upon which he was at work. The alleged ground of liability is the negligence of the city, or that of its street inspector, in placing the plaintiff, as an employee of the city, at work upon such defective machine. If the city, or its street inspector, in operating the stone crusher, was engaged in the performance of a public governmental duty, the defendant, in the absence of any statute making it so, is not responsible in damages to the plaintiff for the injury caused by such act of negligence, either upon the theory that the city failed to perform its duty toward an employee, to provide him a reasonably safe place in which to work or reasonably safe instrumentalities with which to work, or upon the theory that the plaintiff, if not a servant of the city, was injured by the carelessness of the defendant's agent while the latter was performing the defendant's work. If the city was negligent in furnishing its workmen with defective machinery with which to perform a public service, it is exempt from liability for such negligence for the reason that, in all that either the city or the plaintiff did in the performance of such public duty, they acted as governmental agencies, and not in the exercise of any privilege or power for the immediate benefit of the municipality, and because, while so acting, although the city paid the plaintiff for his services, the relation between them was not the ordinary one of master and servant which exists between a city and its employees in the performance of strictly municipal duties. Jones v. New Haven, 34 Conn. 1-13; Jewett v. New Haven, 38 Conn. 368, 9 Am. Rep. 382; Daly v. New Haven, 69 Conn. 644-649, 38 Atl. 397; Bartram v. Sharon, 71 Conn. 686-692, 46 L. R. A. 144, 43 Atl. 143. On the other hand, if the street inspector, as an officer or agent of the city, and as the one having, by authority of the board of street commissioners, and in discharge of the duties imposed upon them by the city charter, the entire care and maintenance of the streets, was guilty of negligence in the performance of a public duty, in using a defective stone crusher, or in failing to provide a proper covering for it while it was in operation, the city of Waterbury is not liable for the consequences of his negligence, since the street inspector was so far a public agent that as to such acts of negligence the rule respondet superior does not apply to the defendant. Judge v. Meriden, 38 Conn. 90-97; Daly v. New Haven, 69 Conn. 644-650, 38 Atl. 397. We had had occasion to state heretofore that the rule which thus exempts municipalities from liability when they or their servants are acting in the discharge of a public duty does not relieve them from responsibility for the negligent acts of their workmen which are not incident to and do not flow from the performance of the public work in which they are engaged, and in doing which acts such workmen are therefore not properly acting as agents of the law, nor from liability for the consequences of the particular acts which the municipality has directed to be performed, and which from their character, or the manner in which they are so ordered to be executed, will naturally work a direct injury to the property of others, or create a nuisance, or occasion a wanton injury to the property or rights of other persons. Judd v. Hartford, 72 Conn. 350, 44 Atl. 510; Norwalk Gaslight Co. v. Norwalk, 63 Conn. 495, 28 Atl. 32; Mootry v. Danbury, 45 Conn. 550-556, 29 Am. Rep. 703; Weed v. Greenwich, 45 Conn. 170-183; Danbury & N. R. Co. v. Norwalk, 37 Conn. 109-119. The trial court, while recognizing the rule of municipal immunity above stated, in effect instructed the jury that when the plaintiff was injured the defendant was not engaged in the performance of a governmental duty. That part of its charge was incorrect. In doing the work of constructing and repairing its highways, the city was clearly performing a governmental act. Jones v. New Haven, 34 Conn. 1-13. The acceptance by the city of a charter authorizing it to discharge such governmental duty neither created a contract between it and the state that such duty should be performed, nor rendered the discharge of such duty the exercise of a special privilege, for the nonperformance or negligent performance of which the city would become liable. Hedison v. New Haven, 37 Conn. 475-482, 9 Am. Rep. 342; Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332. Macadamizing its streets was one of the ways by which the city might perform its duty of maintaining and repairing its highways (New Haven v. Whitney, 36 Conn. 373-376), and it was for the city to decide whether that was the best way of discharging that duty. Hoyt v. Danbury, 69 Conn. 341-352, 37 Atl. 1051; Healey v. New Haven, 47 Conn. 305-314.

It was within the taxing power of the legislature to provide that a reasonable part of the expense of such repairs should be borne by those whose property was especially benefited thereby (New London v. Miller, 60 Conn. 112-116, 22 Atl. 499), and the fact that a part of such expense might be so paid did not make the duty of repairing the streets any the less a governmental one than if the entire expense were to be paid by a general city tax.

The work of breaking, by means of a stone crusher, the stone to be used in macadamizing the street, was a part of the work of macadamizing such street. It was necessary that the stone used in macadamizing should be broken into small pieces. If laborers had been employed to break the stones with hammers, upon the street to be macadamized, it would hardly be said they were not performing a part of the work of macadamizing the street. But to become part of the work of macadamizing it is not necessary that the labor should be performed upon the street to be repaired. Part of the work of macadamizing is necessarily performed elsewhere, as the carrying of the materials to the street. If the city could do the work of breaking the stone more economically and successfully at the quarry than upon the street, and by the use of a machine than by breaking them by hand, it had the right to do the work at Cheshire by means of a stone crusher, and the fact that it did so did not change the character of the work or of the duty which it was performing. Whether or not the stone crusher, either before or after the accident, had been used by the city for other purposes than in macadamizing its streets, was not decisive of the case. It was a question for the jury whether, at the time of the accident, either the city or its street inspector, or its other agents in charge of the work, were in fact engaged in operating the stone crusher for the purpose of macadamizing a city street, as claimed by the defendant. It seems to have been shown at the trial that when the plaintiff was injured the stone crusher was being operated to crush stone to be used, and which in fact were used, in macadamizing a certain street. For an injury sustained by the plaintiff under such circumstances the city has the same immunity from liability as from one suffered by its employee in operating a defective street roller or fire engine. Municipal corporations are not liable unless made so by statute for injuries occasioned by negligence in using or failing to keep in repair the fire engines owned by them. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. p. 976, note 1; Jewett v. New Haven, 38 Conn. 368-361, 9 Am. Rep. 382.

A very similar case in many of its aspects to the one at bar is that of Barney v. Lowell, 98 Mass. 570, cited in Jewett v. New Haven, in which it was held that the city was not liable for an injury caused by the negligence of a teamster, engaged in carting stone from a stone crusher to repair a highway, and employed in that work by the superintendent of streets, who had charge of the repairing of the streets and the crushing of the stone for that purpose.

In the case of Hughes v. Monroe County, 147 N. Y. 49, 39 L. R. A. 33, 41 N. E. 407, it was held that the county was not liable for an injury sustained by one of its employees in operating a steam mangle in a laundry which the servants of the defendant had failed to keep in proper repair; and in Wild v. Paterson, 47 N. J. L. 406, 1 Atl. 490, that the defendant was not liable for an injury to a member of the fire department caused by a defective brake of the steam fire engine which he was assisting in taking to a fire. In the latter case it was held that, since such employees of the corporation were mere instruments in the execution of its public duties, the fact that the plaintiff was a paid employee of the city would not create between them the ordinary relation of master and servant, so as to render the city liable for its failure to keep the engine in good repair.

For the reasons given we think the trial court erred in not charging the jury substantially as requested by the defendant, and in charging that the crushing of stone intended to be used and subsequently used in macadamizing a street was not work done in the care and maintenance of the street.

The allegations in the complaint of a promise by the defendant's foreman to furnish new teeth and a proper covering for the stone crusher were, as stated in plaintiff's brief, not intended as a statement of liability upon a contract, but of facts affecting the question of contributory negligence. As bearing upon that question, the court properly charged the jury that information of such promises, if given to the inspector of streets, was sufficient information to the city.

There is error, and a new trial is granted.

APPEAL by defendant Barrows from a judgment of the Meriden City Court in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover rent alleged to be due and unpaid. Affirmed.

Statement by Prentice, J.:

The finding contains the following statement of facts pertinent to the decision: "(1) Some time in the year 1899 C. N. Blake, then a retail shoe dealer, doing business in Meriden under the name of C. N. Blake & Co., and occupying the store hereinafter referred to, made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors. (2) H. D. Barrows, of New London, bought of the trustee the stock of goods located in the store in Byxbee block, owned by the plaintiffs, which had been formerly leased by Blake, including in said purchase the goodwill of Blake's business. (3) Barrows continued the business in the same store under the name of C. N. Blake & Co. up to the time of this controversy, under the personal supervision and management of the said Blake. (4) The moneys received from the business were deposited in bank by Blake in the name of C. N. Blake & Co., and checks were drawn thereon monthly to the order of the plaintiffs for $83.33, but no special contract was made by Barrows as to the duration of such tenancy. (5) Such checks for rent were given and paid up to and including the month of December, 1900. (6) In November, 1900, Barrows, in person and through Blake, notified the plaintiffs that he intended to change his location, but that, as his new store might not be completed in time, he doubted if he could be entirely ready to make his change by the end of that month, and tried to bargain for the use of the store by the day during the early part of December. (7) The plaintiffs declined to make such an arrangement, and notified Barrows that, if he occupied the store for any time after the last day of November, they should hold him responsible for the rent for the entire month of December. (8) After this notice the tenancy continued as before during the month of December. (9) In the latter part of December it was agreed between the parties that when he should quit the store the tenant might for a short time leave the gas fixtures attached thereto, with the hope of disposing of them to any succeeding tenant. (10) About 6 o'clock in the afternoon of the last day of December, 1900, Blake, acting for Barrows, notified the plaintiffs that the goods were nearly out of the store, and that they would all be out that evening, and asked what he should do with the keys. (11) The plaintiffs replied that they did not care what he did with them, as they could not and would not accept them. (12) They had previously said that they thought they could hold him responsible for the rent for the balance of the year, which would end in April, and their contention on that point had its influence in determining them to refuse to accept the keys. (13) Blake told the plaintiffs that he would like to retain the keys a few days, and occupy the store for the purpose of cleaning it up and leaving it in good order. To this the plaintiffs made no reply. (14) Blake did retain the keys, remained in possession, cleared out the rubbish, removed several articles used as trade fixtures, which had been taken down and left in the store, and finally offered the keys to the plaintiffs on January 5th. On January 7th he took down the sign from the store front, which bore the words 'C. N. Blake & Co.,' and had been there before and since the purchase by Barrows. (15) The plaintiffs did not accept the keys, and Blake placed them on a window seat in the room where he found one of the plaintiffs, and left them there. . . . (20) No stock of goods remained in the store after December 31st, and no regular shoe business was carried on therein by the defendants after that date.

Messrs. H. A. Hull and W. F. M. Rogers, for appellant Barrows:

The plaintiffs, by their conduct, waived any further attempt upon the part of the defendant to tender the keys. On the night of December 31st Barrows's connection with the premises ceased. The personal request of Blake, for reasons of his own, without authority from Barrows, to retain the keys to clean up the store shows that Barrows was not in possession in January, and characterizes the possession, even by Blake, as not that of a tenant, but of a licensee and for the benefit of the plaintiffs. Occupancy under such circumstances is not tenancy.

Lewis v. Havens, 40 Conn. 363; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 406.

Mr. George A. Fay, for appellees:

The defendants were tenants from month to month, viz., the lease was by parol,—a monthly rent reserved and time of termination not agreed upon.

Corbett v. Cochrane, 67 Conn. 571, 35 Atl. 509.

Whether the person in possession is tenant at will, at sufferance, or claiming under them, the legal consequence is the same. The person once a tenant, so long as he remains in the occupation of the land demised, must be deemed to continue in that character unless he has surrendered the possession to his landlord.

Camp v. Camp, 5 Conn. 301, 13 Am. Dec. 60.

After the expiration of a lease for a year, if the tenant holds over the law considers him responsible to his landlord, as on a hiring for another year, upon the same terms as before.

Bacon v. Brown, 9 Conn. 338; Lockwood v. Lockwood, 22 Conn. 431; King v. Woodruff, 23 Conn. 56, 60 Am. Dec. 625.

And the tenant does hold over, unless he surrenders the leased premises to the landlord within the term.

Bacon v. Brown, 9 Conn. 336; Redpath v. Roberts, 3 Esp. 225; Harland v. Brom- ley, 1 Starkie, 455; Camp v. Camp, 5 Conn. 291, 13 Am. Dec. 60.

Where a tenant is in possession under a lease for an indefinite term, or under a general permission to occupy, and pays a periodical rent, a periodical tenancy is thereby created, the length of the recurring periods of which is to be determined by the character of the payments.

18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 193-201; Hollis v. Burns, 100 Pa. 206, 45 Am. Rep. 379.

Notice by a tenant that he does not intend to occupy after expiration of the present term does not relieve him of his liability as a tenant holding over.

Smith v. Bell, 44 Minn. 524, 47 N. W. 263; Conway v. Starkweather, 1 Denio, 114; Haynes v. Aldrich, 133 N. Y. 290, 31 N. E. 94.

To constitute a termination there must be a voluntary surrender by lessee and acceptance by lessor, or an entry, animo clamandi, for the purpose of taking possession.

Holly v. Brown, 14 Conn. 270.

Prentice, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Whatever construction is put upon the somewhat meager facts contained in the finding in determining the nature of the defendant's tenancy, the result is the same as to the effect of a holding over after the end of any month. If it be held, as the plaintiffs claim, that the facts, involving, as they do, the payment and acceptance for more than a year of a monthly rental, raise an implied agreement for a tenancy for monthly periods, with no fixed time of termination, the defendant would, by holding over beyond the end of any month, become liable for an additional month's rent. Bacon v. Brown, 9 Conn. 334; Miller v. Lampson, 66 Conn. 432, 34 Atl. 79; Anderson v. Prindle, 23 Wend. 616; Steffens v. Earl, 40 N. J. L. 137, 29 Am. Rep. 214; Hollis v. Burns, 100 Pa. 208, 45 Am. Rep. 379; Brewer v. Knapp, 1 Pick. 332; Blumenberg v. Myres, 32 Cal. 93, 91 Am. Dec. 560; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 405. If, on the other hand, it be held, as the defendant contends, that there was during the month of December a tenancy under an express agreement for that month, the result would be the same. Stoppelkamp v. Mangeot, 42 Cal. 316; Brewer v. Knapp, 1 Pick. 332; Coffin v. Lunt, 2 Pick. 70; Bright v. McQuat, 40 Ind. 527; Taylor, Land. & T. § 57. These results would follow quite apart from the operation of § 2967 of the General Statutes, which, therefore, need not be considered.

The only question left for consideration is whether or not the court erred in ruling that upon the facts the defendant held over after December 31st, up to which time he paid the rent. We think that no other conclusion could have been consistently reached. During the late afternoon of December 31st, Blake, who was the defendant's manager, notified the plaintiffs that the defendant's goods were nearly out of the store, and that they would all be out that evening, and asked what he should do with the keys. The plaintiffs replied that they did not care what he did with them, as they could not and would not accept them. Blake then said that he would like to keep the keys a few days, and occupy the store for the purpose of cleaning it up and leaving it in good order. To this statement no reply was made. The keys were kept. There was no attempt to deliver or tender them until five days later. Meantime, Blake remained in possession, cleaned out the rubbish, and removed some articles used as trade fixtures. This having been done, Blake on January 5th offered the keys to the plaintiffs, which were not received. On the 7th the firm's sign was taken down. Subsequent history does not concern the result. After December 31st no stock of goods remained in the store, and no regular business was there carried on by the defendant. These facts clearly establish (1) that actual possession of the store was withheld from the plaintiffs until January 5th; (2) that no attempt to make formal delivery of possession was ever in fact made before that date; (3) that the plaintiffs never did or said anything which would amount to a waiver of the actual vacation of the premises; (4) that the continued possession was the same in outward appearance after as before December 31st, to wit, a possession directed and controlled by Blake; (5) that the plaintiffs never consented to any occupancy without payment of rent; (6) that the plaintiffs never accepted any tenant in substitution for the defendant. The only one of these conclusions calling for discussion is the first, and this needs little. The court has found it as a fact. He has found that Blake was in possession. Although there was no stock of goods remaining, and no regular business done, the store, clearly, was not vacated. Possession thereof was not surrendered to the landlord, within the meaning of the law or the doctrine of any case known to us. Thomas v. Frost, 29 Mich. 336; Haynes v. Aldrich, 133 N. Y. 287, 31 N. E. 94. The situation was not one where the tenant had simply failed to remove a few articles. It was one where there continued to be upon the premises the actual bodily presence of an occupant who was not in through or under the plaintiffs. This occupant was none other than the defendant's manager. If it had been the defendant instead of Blake, and the defendant had been present throughout the events of December 31st and the following days, doing and saying what Blake did and said, there would be little plausibility to a claim that he had, either in fact or legal effect, vacated the premises. In saying this we place no stress upon the failure to deliver up the keys. Possibly it might be said that that formality had been waived. There certainly had been no waiver of removal. Until there had been such removal, the defendant was in no position to take advantage of any advance refusal to receive the keys or acknowledge a surrender. He was bound, as a condition precedent to the exercise of any claim of surrender, to vacate. As long as he occupied, there was no escape, without the consent of the landlord, from a holding over. We therefore have no need to inquire what would have been the result if he had, under the circumstances, not occupied.

We are thus brought to the only remaining question,—as to the effect of Blake's acts and occupancy. Were they, in legal effect, the acts and occupancy of the defendant? This question admits of only an affirmative answer. Blake was, and from the beginning had been, the manager of the defendant's business as conducted in the store in question. The defendant, after his purchase of the business, nowhere personally appears in the finding. Blake invariably acts for him. Blake was the defendant's representative in the removal of the business, the vacation of the store, and its surrender to the landlord. He was the defendant's representative in the interview of December 31st. This the defendant concedes, since he desires to avail himself of the benefit of Blake's acts down to a certain point. Then, forsooth, it is contended that Blake suddenly appeared in a new role, and from the moment when he asked to retain the keys assumed the character of a person acting for himself, and no longer represented his principal. Why he should be anxious to personally undertake a duty with respect to the premises which would naturally devolve upon his principal, is not suggested. What there is in the finding to support the contention, we fail to discover. There is no statement to that effect. There can arise no implication to that effect, unless it arise from the fact that the court, in its narrative of the facts, after setting out Blake's managerial relations, failed in its recital of his acts and words to qualify them in each separate instance by words expressive of his agency. The narrative in the finding follows the natural course. After giving a part of the conversation between Blake and the plaintiffs, the former's next act is given. Only a most strained construction, and one which leads to most unnatural consequences, can give any color at all to this claim to which the exigencies of the defendant necessarily drive him. These considerations take no account of the unfairness to the plaintiffs of such a construction. Dealing with the defendant's manager in a matter of the defendant's business which he had long conducted, they were justified in regarding Blake as acting, as he in fact was, for the defendant, and as having full authority to act in the matter in hand. He cannot be heard to say that Blake's authority extended only to a certain point. The jugglery of a change of character to the plaintiffs' harm without a word of warning to them, or ground for suspicion on their part, cannot be permitted. Clearly, Blake, throughout the whole matter in controversy, was, in legal effect, the defendant himself. Such being the case, the judgment of the court below, which was for the rent of the store for the month of January, was, upon the finding, justified.

There is no error.

DELAWARE SUPREME COURT.

JOHNSON FORGE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

John LEONARD et al.

(.....Del.....)

1. The question whether or not a letter by a purchaser of scrap iron to be paid for as each 100 tons was delivered, stating that he would not remit until he had enough of the balance of the contract in his hands to know that he would receive the amount purchased, and that as soon as he had two or three cars above the 100 tons he would remit, amounts to a repudiation of the contract justifying a rescission on the part of the seller, is for the court.
2. An intention to repudiate the contract by a buyer of scrap iron who is to pay for each 100 tons as delivered, justifying a rescission by the seller, is shown where, after receiving 100 tons, he insists on having two or three car loads more delivered before remitting for the 100 tons.

(January 21, 1902.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Newcastle County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the value of certain iron delivered by plaintiffs to defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Benjamin Nields and John P. Nields, for plaintiff in error:

The payment for the first instalment was not a condition precedent to delivery of the second instalment.

Mersey Steel & I. Co. v. Naylor, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 439.

Defendant's conduct in failing to pay for the first instalment was not a breach going to the whole consideration.

Id. 446.

Defendant's conduct in this case in failing to pay for the first instalment as agreed did not evince an intention to repudiate the contract.

Freeth v. Burr, L. R. 9 C. P. 213.

Where a breach may be paid for in damages, there the defendant has a remedy on his covenant, and shall not plead it as a condition precedent.

It is a question of fact for the determination of a jury whether the words and conduct of the defendant amounted to a repudiation of its contract, justifying rescission on the part of the plaintiffs.

Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 29 L. ed. 366, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 12.

Boyce, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs brought their action of indebitatus assumpsit for the recovery of the value of the scrap iron delivered to the defendant under the following contract:

New York, Feb. 25, 1899.

Sold to Johnson Forge Co., Wilmington, Del., for account of Messrs. Jno. Leonard & Co., about three hundred (300) tons number one wrought scrap iron, delivered f. o. b. cars at the works of the buyer, provided the cars can make a delivery at their works. Price, fourteen and one-half (14.50) dollars per ton of 2,240 lbs. Cash payable on receipt of each one hundred (100) tons.

George H. Jones, Broker.

Accepted March 1, 1899.

Counsel for the buyer admits that, between the time of the execution of the said contract and the 29th day of June following, there were shipped to and accepted by it four cars of said iron, aggregating 100 tons or more. The correspondence shows that during this period seven cars were shipped, and that three of them were rejected because of quality, and afterwards returned or taken away. He alleges that the sellers were caught in a rapidly rising market, and that because of this it was to their interest to get rid of the contract, while for the same reason the buyer was naturally desirous of holding the sellers to their contract. The record is silent as to the evidence upon this point. On the 28th of June the sellers wrote to the buyer, requesting "check for our account as per contract," and on the following date the buyer replied: ". . . In regards to remitting, we will not remit for this lot until we get enough of the balance of the contract in our hands to know that we will receive the amount we have purchased. We will therefore thank you to rush forward the whole contract with the class of iron that is now here, and which will be satisfactory; and, as soon as we have two or three cars over and above the 100 tons upon which payment is to be made, we will remit you check." On the next day the sellers wrote: ". . . We would say that that is not our agreement. If you will look over your contract, you will find that you are to remit on receiving each 100 tons, and we want the check immediately for the 100 tons of scrap iron shipped you. If not sent immediately, we will put the matter in the hands of our attorney for collection." And they did not subsequently make any other shipments, or offer to make any; nor does it appear that they again wrote to the buyer relative to the breach. The buyer, however, 57 L. R. A.

on July 11th following, wrote: ". . . We are therefore willing and ready to pay your bill if we have an assurance you will complete your contract. If you will, therefore, send us one or two car loads of same quality as the last, as soon as it is received we will send you check for what has been delivered. . . . We are much in want of the scrap purchased of you, and request you to complete your contract at once, and you will receive payment as was originally understood,"—and again, on August 9th, wrote: ". . . Unless you commence shipping on the above quantity by the 15th inst., we will go into the market and purchase the above quantity at the very lowest price we are able to get it at, and will charge any difference in the price to your account, over and above our contract with you." The sellers brought their said action on the 15th day of September following. Counsel for the buyer admitted the sellers' right of action for the 100 tons of iron delivered and accepted, but denied their right to rescind the contract, and, by way of recoupment, set up a counterclaim to an amount exceeding the demand of the sellers, for the failure of the latter to deliver the remaining 200 tons of iron sold. He also conceded that the right to counterclaim depends upon the existence of a subsisting contract, and that if there had been a repudiation, in fact, of the contract at bar, and by reason thereof the contract had been rescinded, then the right to counterclaim did not exist. He contended that the default made in the payment for the said 100 tons received and accepted was not a breach of a condition precedent, nor was it such a breach as that it affected the whole of the consideration, and that therefore the sellers were not discharged from deliveries yet remaining due from them. He also alleged that it was a question of fact for the determination of the jury whether the words and conduct of the buyer amounted to a repudiation of its contract, justifying rescission on the part of the sellers. The sellers (regarding the conduct of the buyer as a repudiation of the contract, justifying their rescission), by their counsel, denied the right of the buyer to set up its counterclaim, and insisted that the question of repudiation involved in the case, as well as the character of the evidence produced to establish it, were matters of law for the court.

The defendant requested the court below to charge "that if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the acts and conduct of the defendant as shown in this case did not evince an intention no longer to be bound by, or do not show an intention wholly to abandon, the contract of February 25th, then the defendant is entitled to recoup, by way of counterclaim to plaintiffs' demand, such damages as it suffered by reason of the plaintiffs' failure to deliver 199 tons and 1,780 pounds of said iron under said contract. . . ." The court, in their charge to the jury, inter alia, said: "We decline so to charge, for the reason that it would be submitting to the jury, as a question of fact, that which has already been decided as a question of law by the court in its rulings upon the admissibility of evidence upon that point. We have seen no reason to change our view in this respect.

This [defendant's letter of June 29th] was a demand that the plaintiffs should put into the hands of the defendant two or three cars over the 100 tons, by way of pledge or guaranty for the performance of the contract, as a new condition for the payment already due thereunder, and was insisting upon new terms, different from the original agreement, which was 'Cash payable on receipt of each one hundred tons.' Under this admitted state of facts, the court held, as a matter of law, that the plaintiffs were relieved from further delivery by such a refusal, under the circumstances."

There are three assignments of error, based substantially upon that part of the charge which we have quoted, and they present two distinct questions for our determination: (1) Whether the act and conduct of the defendant amounted to a repudiation of the contract, justifying a rescission; (2) whether the determination of that question is one of fact for the jury.

Before proceeding to consider these questions, it may not be inappropriate to determine the nature and character of the contract before us, for one among the several reasons which may be assigned for the conflict in the decisions touching contracts of this sort is the difficulty at times in determining the question of the divisibility of the promise in the particular case. Whether the contract is entire or severable is frequently a matter of interpretation, depending on the intention of the parties, to be gathered from their acts, under all the facts and circumstances of the particular transaction. The contract in this case is clearly an illustration of a contract of sale which is entire on one side, and apportionable on the other; i. e., a contract for the sale and delivery of a specific quantity of scrap iron (about 300 tons), without doubt to be delivered within a reasonable time, in carload lots, to be paid for in equal instalments of 100 tons. Mersey Steel & I. Co. v. Naylor, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 434; Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 29 L. ed. 366, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 12. And it is a divisible contract, in the sense that an action may be maintained for the recovery of the value of each 100 tons of the iron, upon the delivery and acceptance thereof, if payment should be neglected or refused; for where the seller delivers an agreed portion, which the buyer accepts, and payment thereof becomes immediately due, the right to recover is at once complete. Pope v. Porter, 102 N. Y. 360, 7 N. E. 304. Hence the effect of such a breach as has been shown in this case, if nothing else, was to confer a right of action upon the sellers for the instalment delivered. But whether the injured party should bring his action upon the contract for part performance, where his right of action has become complete by reason of the divisible character of the contract, or for the value of a benefit conferred upon the defaulting party, where the breach of the latter clearly operates as a discharge of the contract, the right of recovery is distinguishable; for in the first instance the remedy of the injured party is upon the contract, while in the latter his right to recover is founded upon a promise imposed by law. The action brought in this case is of the latter kind. In contracts of the nature of the one before us, it is, indeed, often quite difficult to determine whether or not a particular breach of one of the provisions or series of items therein by one of the parties in the course of performance discharges the injured party; but, in the absence of express stipulations to the contrary, it seems to be quite generally maintained, at least by the better considered cases, that a breach which only deprives the injured party of a benefit of one of these subsidiary provisions or promises will not, as a rule, relieve him from such further performance as may be due from him under the contract, and he is left to redress his injury by an action for compensation in damages.

We come now to consider specifically the questions raised by the errors assigned, and we will first consider, not whether the act and conduct of the buyer showed an intention no longer to be bound by the contract, but whether the question of intention, whatever it was, was a matter of evidence for the jury. While, under the facts and circumstances of the particular case, the intention to be gathered from the acts and conduct of the party in default may be a question of fact for the jury, yet in this case we are clearly of the opinion that the interpretation and effect of the said letter of June 29th were questions of law for the court. Whether the effect of said letter amounted to a repudiation of the contract, justifying a rescission on the part of the sellers, presents a question, in view of the conflicting decisions in both this country and England, which is, at best, unsettled. Very much of the difficulty which has led to the want of harmony in the decisions seems to be the natural result of the failure to adopt any uniform rule of construction with reference to the relation which the subsidiary promises contained in this class of contracts bear to each other, and the consequent effect of a breach of one of them upon the whole contract. Some of the cases seem to have regarded these stipulations as independent of each other, while others have treated them as conditional. Other decisions have regarded time of performance and payment according to stipulation (particularly the latter) as severally entering into the essence of the contract, and cases exactly alike in all material facts have been decided differently for these and other constructional reasons. We have quite carefully examined many of the leading cases upon this question, and we do not deem it necessary or useful, for the purpose of this case, to attempt to distinguish or reconcile them. Indeed, as was said by Lindley, L. J., in the court of appeals, in the case of Mersey

Steel & I. Co. v. Naylor, L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 668, in referring to certain cases, each case may be understood by itself, but there is very considerable difficulty in reconciling them. There is conspicuous authority for the rule that a breach of contract of this sort which does not go to the entire consideration will not sustain a rescission. By this rule, compensation in damages for a breach less pronounced in its character is substituted for the remedy afforded by rescission. And this was the position assumed by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, which he urged upon the attention of the court with much learning and ability. It seems to us, the courts may often by the force of such a rule create for the parties to the particular contract another, differing essentially from that which was originally intended; and, besides, the effect of the adoption of such a rule must be to negative the wholesome stimulus to observe the several subsidiary promises contained in these contracts, which lies in the remedy of rescission. While it is quite impossible to lay down any absolute rule for guidance in all cases of this character, under the varying facts and circumstances of the particular case, yet, in our opinion, the rule that will best promote the important commercial interests involved in contracts of this nature, and one that will work out the most beneficial results in accordance with reason and justice, is that if a default by one party in making particular payments or deliveries, except in cases of neglect, omission, or inadvertence, is accompanied with an announcement of intention not to perform the contract upon the agreed terms, or if, in the language of the court below, the default is accompanied with a deliberate demand, "insisting upon new terms different from the original agreement," the other party may treat the contract as being at an end. Anson, Contr. *283; Withers v. Reynolds, 2 Barn. & Ad. 882; Stephenson v. Cady, 117 Mass. 6; Blackburn v. Reilly, 47 N. J. L. 290, 54 Am. Rep. 159, 1 Atl. 27. We may further add that nonpayment or nondelivery will not of itself ordinarily be sufficient to warrant a rescission. Yet, under the particular facts and circumstances of the case such a default may be evidence of an intention no longer to be bound by the agreed terms of the contract.

It is our opinion that the fair and reasonable import and legal effect of the refusal to pay for the iron, for the recovery of the value of which this action has been brought, accompanied, as it was, with the announcement that, "in regards to remitting, we will not remit you for this lot until we get enough of the balance of the contract in our hands to know that we will receive the amount we have purchased," evinced an intention no longer to be bound by the terms of the contract. It is true that in said letter the buyer further said, "We will therefore thank you to rush forward the whole contract with the class of iron that is now here, and which will be satisfactory;" but in ordinary contracts of this nature the party defaulting in the manner and to the extent which we have laid down may not escape the penalty of his act of repudiation, which the right of rescission inflicts, by manifesting at the time of the default a desire to have the injured party continue the performance notwithstanding such default. The intention of repudiation, under such circumstances, if in fact it exists, is none the less manifest because, perchance, the party in default may urge a continuance of performance.

It may be added to what has already been said that the plaintiff in error greatly relied on the cases of Mersey Steel & I. Co. v. Naylor, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 434, L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 648, and Freeth v. Burr, L. R. 9 C. P. 208; while the defendants in error, in a like manner, relied upon Withers v. Reynolds, 2 Barn. & Ad. 882.

The facts in Mersey Steel & I. Co. v. Naylor were: Defendants agreed to purchase from the Mersey Steel & Iron Company a large quantity of steel booms, to be delivered in monthly instalments; payment to be made within three days after receipt of shipping documents. When about half of first instalment had been delivered, but before payment became due, a petition was presented to wind up the company. Defendants, being mistakenly advised by their solicitor, wrote expressing a doubt whether they could safely make payment to the company pending the petition, and asked the company to obtain an order of the court to sanction their doing so. The company replied: "What will be the result of the petition, we cannot say. . . . We must ask you to be good enough to observe your part of the contract, by remitting us promptly." Replying to another letter of similar import from the defendants, the company said: "We shall therefore consider your refusal to pay for the goods already delivered as a breach of contract on your part, and as relieving us from any further obligations on our part." A few days thereafter a winding-up order was made, and defendants' solicitor wrote to the liquidator that the defendants claimed damages for nondelivery, and were prepared to accept and pay for all further deliveries without deducting damages,—payments to be carried to a separate account without prejudice to claim for damages,—and suggested that his clients might consent to accept delivery now, and waive the damages. The liquidator refused to make further deliveries, and commenced an action to recover the price of what had been delivered. The defendants set up a counterclaim for damages. Held, reversing the decision of Lord Coleridge, Ch. J., that the plaintiffs were not entitled to rescind, and were liable for damages for nondelivery. It was held in the House of Lords that the refusal to pay in that case was not such as to bring it at all within the principle of Freeth v. Burr and Withers v. Reynolds. Indeed, the postponement of payment, under the circumstances of the case, was not regarded as a refusal to pay, but only as a "demur or delay," under a misapprehension as to the legal effect of the proceedings for winding up the company, pending those proceedings. And from the opinions expressed in that case, and the dissimilarity of the facts in this case from that, we may safely conclude that the refusal to pay in the case at bar, coupled with the buyer's demand, contained in its said letter of June 29th, takes it out of the case of Mersey Steel & I. Co. v. Naylor. Inasmuch, therefore, as it is quite manifest that this case does not come within the authority of Mersey Steel & I. Co. v. Naylor, it becomes necessary to inquire whether it comes within the principle of Freeth v. Burr and Withers v. Reynolds, or either of them; both of these cases having been recognized and approved in that case.

The facts in Freeth v. Burr were: Plaintiffs agreed to buy of the defendant 250 tons of pig iron; half to be delivered in two, remainder in four, weeks; payment net cash fourteen days after delivery of each parcel. The delivery of the first parcel, of about 125 tons, was not completed for nearly six months, after repeated demands by plaintiffs. Upon the defendant asking for check under contract, the plaintiffs refused to pay, claiming a set-off, but urged the delivery of the balance of the iron. The defendant treated the refusal as an abandonment of the contract, and, declining to make further deliveries, brought an action against the plaintiffs. The latter subsequently paid for the iron delivered, and brought an action against the defendant for refusing to deliver the balance under the contract. Held, that the refusal to pay was not, under the circumstances, sufficient to warrant a rescission of the contract on the part of the defendant. The facts in Withers v. Reynolds were: R. agreed to supply W. with straw, to be delivered at the premises of W., at a price per load; each load to be paid for on delivery. R. shipped straw for some time, and, when he asked for payment therefor, W. tendered part only, retaining the price of the last load, and said he would always keep the price of one load in hand. The seller refused to make other deliveries. The buyer sued for nondelivery. Held, that the plaintiff could not recover; Lord Tenterden, Ch. J., saying: "The only question is whether, upon the plaintiff's saying, 'I will not pay for the goods on delivery' (for that was the effect of his communication to the defendant), it was incumbent on the defendant to go on supplying straw; and he clearly was not obliged to do so." There is no mistaking the fact that the principle laid down in Freeth v. Burr, and affirmed in Mersey Steel & I. Co. v. Naylor, was as stated by Lord Coleridge himself in delivering his judgment in the former case: "The true question is whether the acts and conduct of the parties evince an intention no longer to be bound by the contract." This is undoubtedly the true test by which to determine the effect of the acts and conduct of the parties, when they do not manifestly amount to an express refusal to perform the contract upon the agreed terms; the substance of the test being, as was said by Lord Chancellor Selborne in Mersey Steel & I. Co. v. Naylor, that, "you must look at the actual circumstances of the case, in order to see whether the one party to the contract is relieved from its further performance by the conduct of the other. You must examine what that conduct is, so as to see whether it amounts to a renunciation,—to an absolute refusal to perform the contract. . . . And in this view of the case, we fully concur with the principle therein enunciated. We have the opinion of Lord Coleridge, Ch. J., in that case, that 'in Withers v. Reynolds there was an express refusal by the plaintiff to perform the contract,' and he quotes Patteson, J., as saying: "If the plaintiff had merely failed to pay for any particular load, that of itself might not have been an excuse to the defendant for delivering no more straw. But the plaintiff here expressly refuses to pay for the loads as delivered. The defendant therefore is not liable for ceasing to perform his part of the contract." He further adds: "Wightman, J., certainly, and Crompton, J., by inference, in Jonasohn v. Young, 4 Best & S., at page 299, both uphold that case upon the principle on which I rely. The principle to be applied in these cases is whether the nondelivery or the nonpayment amounts to an abandonment of the contract or refusal to perform it on the part of the person so making default." And Denman, J., in the same case, said: "I am of opinion, upon the authority of Withers v. Reynolds, that the ruling was quite right. That case did not decide expressly that a mere failure of a single payment might not be evidence of a refusal to perform the contract. But in the words of Patteson, J., the conduct of the plaintiff, coupled with the nonpayment, amounted to an express refusal to perform the contract on his part." And in an earlier part of the same case, referring to Withers v. Reynolds, he said: "There the plaintiff did acts and said things which amounted to a declaration on his part that he did not mean to perform the contract." This last statement applies fittingly to the conduct of the buyer in the case at bar, and quite clearly expresses the meaning and effect of said letter of June 29th. The principle of Freeth v. Burr is a correct statement of the law for guidance in determining the character of the refusal to perform, and its effect upon the contract, when the intention to be gathered from the acts and conduct of the party in default is not manifest; and Withers v. Reynolds correctly states the law where the refusal to perform is coupled with conduct which amounts to an express refusal to perform the contract upon the agreed terms. The two cases are not in conflict, as thus distinguished, and when carefully considered they must be so distinguished.

We are not unmindful of the fact that it has been contended that the admitted breach in this case was no more than a refusal to pay for a single instalment of 100 tons, and that it was, unlike that in Withers v. Rey- nolds, not prospective in its character. In our opinion, it does not change the effect of the refusal, whether it operates prospectively or not, if in fact it is coupled with a declaration of intention, amounting to an express refusal, not to be bound by the agreed terms of the contract. The refusal to pay, accompanied with such an announcement, was the controlling element in Withers v. Reynolds, such as we regard it in this case. And lastly we may say that the buyer has his remedy for compensation in damages for a default, as well as the seller; and, each enjoying this right on equal terms, neither may seek special advantage, to the detriment, perhaps, of the other, by deliberately imposing new terms upon the contract.

The court below rightly found, as conclusions of law, under the facts of this case, that the buyer repudiated the said contract, entitling the sellers to rescind it, and the judgment below is affirmed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

Mayor, etc., of AMERICUS et al., Pliffs. in Err.,

v.

*1. Under an act entitled "An Act to Amend, Revise, and Consolidate the Several Acts Granting Corporate Authority to the City of Americus, to Confer Additional Powers upon the Mayor and City Council of Americus, to Extend the Corporate Limits of Said City, and for Other Purposes" it was competent for the general assembly to provide for a board of police commissioners which should have the exclusive control of the police officers of the city; and a provision in the act to this effect, and also naming the first members of the board, prescribing the manner in which their successors should be chosen, and setting forth their duties and powers, was not subject to the objection that it contained matter different from what was expressed in the title of the act.

2. There is nothing in the Constitution of this state which guarantees to the people living within the limits of a municipal corporation the absolute right of local self-government. How far people so situated may be allowed to participate in the choice of officers who are to administer the affairs of the local government is a matter exclusively within the judgment and discretion of the general assembly.

3. The general assembly may take from a municipal corporation its charter power respecting the police and their appointment, and may by statute provide for a permanent police for the corporation, under the control of a board of police not elected by the people of the municipality, nor appointed or elected by the corporate authorities, but consisting of commissioners appointed in such other manner as the general assembly may direct.

4. The power to appoint public officers is not purely an executive function, but this power may be exercised by the general assembly, when not otherwise provided in the Constitution, either by naming a given person for the office, or providing the manner in which the officer shall be chosen; and the general assembly also has authority to provide for the appointment of a number of officers to discharge a given duty, and provide that vacancies in such number may be filled by those remaining in office, thus creating a self-perpetuating body.

5. If the mayor and council of the city of Americus have, under the present charter, any authority whatever to appoint a police force, such authority cannot be exercised unless the board of police commissioners fall or refuse to provide the city with an efficient police.

6. A court of equity will, at the instance of citizens and taxpayers of a municipal corporation, enjoin the authorities in charge of the affairs of such corporation from carrying into effect an ultra vires ordinance providing for the election of certain public officers, for the reason that if such officers are elected they will have an apparent demand against the municipality for compensation, which will have to be resisted at the expense of the taxpayers, or illegally paid out of the funds of the corporation.

7. The foregoing disposes of all of the questions raised by the demurrer, the answer, or otherwise, which requires any discussion. There was no sufficient cause shown for not granting the injunction prayed for, and the judge properly granted the same.

(March 11, 1902.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Sumter County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action to enjoin the enforcement of an ordinance abolishing the board of police commissioners. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Allen Fort & Son, James Taylor, and E. A. Hawkins, for plaintiffs in error:

The court has no jurisdiction in matters of a political nature, nor to interfere with the duties of any department of government, unless under special circumstances, and when necessary to the protection of the rights of property.

The legislative intent was to confer upon the mayor and city council of Americus the usual powers granted to like corporations. The power conferred upon said mayor and city council includes full police power, the right to appoint police, prescribe their powers, and define their duties, etc. The effort to confer such power upon the board of police commissioners failed.

Americus Bd. of Public Edu. v. Barlow, 49 Ga. 233.

Section 45 of the city charter is unconstitutional, because violative of Const. art. 1, § 1, ¶ 1, Code, § 5698: "All government of right originates with the people, is founded upon their will only, and is instituted solely for the good of the whole. Public officers are the trustees and servants of the people, and at all times amenable to them." And it deprives the people of the municipality and the mayor and city council of Americus of the right of local self-government, as is guaranteed to them by art. 2, § 5, ¶¶ 1 and 2, of the Constitution.

2 High, Inj. 3d ed. §§ 1243, 1244 et seq.; Harrison v. New Orleans, 33 La. Ann. 222, 39 Am. Rep. 272.

Section 45 of the charter, creating a police commission appointed by the legislature, with power delegated to them to elect their successors without reference to the rights of the people, and disfranchising the people of Americus, both directly and indirectly, is unconstitutional and void. There is nothing in the title which suggests the creation of such a constituted police commission, and it is not germane to the matter set forth in the title, and said section contains more than one subject-matter.

Ga. Code, § 5771; Huff v. Markham, 70 Ga. 284; Blair v. State, 90 Ga. 326, 17 S. E. 96; Dempsey v. State, 94 Ga. 768, 22 S. E. 57; Whitendale v. Dixon, 70 Ga. 721; Americus Bd. of Public Edu. v. Barlow, 49 Ga. 232.

The legislature has no constitutional authority to appoint municipal officers with power to elect their own successors in perpetuity. The appointment of local officers of this character is not a legislative function. The legislature's office is to make laws, and they have no appointive power except that which was expressly delegated in the Constitution, which this is not.

The police board as constituted in § 45 is unconstitutional because said § 45 deprives the people of Americus of the inherent right of local self-government in denying to said people the right to choose, either directly or indirectly, the police commission, and in placing over them an absolute despotism in perpetuity without responsibility to the people, either directly or indirectly.

The right of local self-government is a right that is alienable. It inheres in a Republican government, and our Constitution was framed with reference to it.

Police commissioners are local or civil officers. They and their appointees have only local jurisdiction, and the police elected are paid by the city, and not by the state, no compensation being paid to the commissioners. Being local officers they should be elected either by the people of the city or their representatives, the mayor and city council, and the legislature has no power to deny them this right.

Messrs. J. H. Lumpkin, Lane & Maynard, W. F. Wallis, and Blalock & Cobb for defendants in error.

Cobb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an application by Perry and others, as chairman and members of the board of police commissioners of the city of Americus, and as citizens and taxpayers of that city, on behalf of themselves and other citizens and taxpayers, to enjoin the mayor and council of the city of Americus, and Felder and others, the mayor, aldermen, and marshal of that city, from carrying into effect certain ordinances adopted by the mayor and council, which, if valid, had the effect of abolishing the board of police commissioners and the office of chief of police. The mayor and council, and the mayor and marshal individually, by demurrer and answer, showed for cause various reasons against the granting of the injunction. Three of the members of the council, being a minority of that body, filed an answer, which, in substance, set forth that they were opposed to the action of the council as set forth in the ordinances referred to in the petition; that they had never indorsed or acquiesced therein, and were not responsible for any attempt to put the same into execution. At the hearing the injunction prayed for was granted, and this judgment is assigned as error.

1. On November 11, 1889, an act was approved which had the following title: "An Act Entitled an Act to Amend, Revise, and Consolidate the Several Acts Granting Corporate Authority to the City of Americus; to Confer Additional Powers upon the Mayor and City Council of Americus; to Extend the Corporate Limits of Said City, and for Other Purposes." Acts 1889, p. 961; Americus City Code (1900) p. 2. The 45th section of this act provided, in substance, that there should be a board of police commissioners for the city of Americus, consisting of five named persons, two to hold office for six years, two for four years, and the last one named for two years; that at a meeting of such board in December, 1891, and each succeeding two years thereafter, those members of the board of commissioners then in office should elect a commissioner or commissioners to succeed those whose term or terms would then expire. The board was given power to fill vacancies in the same. Each member of the board was required to take an oath, which was set forth. The act then provided that "the board of commissioners thus elected and qualified shall have the exclusive power, and it shall be their duty, to appoint a chief of police and such other police officers and policemen as are, or may be, prescribed by city ordinance." The manner in which the board should conduct its business, and the method of keeping a record of its proceedings, were then set forth. It is declared that the police force of the city should consist of a chief of police, and such other officers and men as the city council shall by ordinance prescribe. The time when such police officers should be chosen, and the manner in which they should be qualified, and certain duties incumbent upon them, are set forth; and the section authorizes the board of police commissioners to impose upon them such other duties as they shall see proper. The compensation of the policemen is to be such as shall be prescribed by ordinance, which shall not be increased or diminished during their terms of office; and the board of police commissioners is authorized to suspend or remove from office the officers and policemen elected by it, and in case of suspension the board is authorized to appoint officers to hold during the time that any officer is suspended. It is contended that this section of the city charter is void, for the reason that it contains matter different from what is expressed in the title of the act. We do not think the section is subject to this objection. The general purpose of the act, as indicated in the title, is to prescribe the conditions upon which the people of the city of Americus may be allowed, within the limits of that municipality, to exercise the powers of government. It is in effect, though not in words, an act to create a new charter for the city of Americus. Any matter relating to the subject of the local government to be authorized for the city of Americus is germane to the general purpose of the act as indicated in the title. Under this title the general assembly could confer upon the city authorities any power that the Constitution does not prohibit it from conferring upon a municipal corporation; it could also expressly refuse to confer powers which might have been exercised in the past by other municipal corporations, and could withdraw from the city authorities of Americus any power formerly exercised by them under the provisions of any charter previously granted. It is hard to conceive of a title which would be broader, so far as the affairs of a municipal corporation are concerned, than the title of the act under consideration. If the title had been, "An Act to Incorporate the City of Americus, and for Other Purposes," broad as such a title would be, it would hardly be broader than the one under consideration; and, as said above, the title is, in effect, one indicating a purpose to create a new charter for the city. It is said, however, that the title indicates that the purpose of the general assembly was to confer additional powers upon the city of Americus, and that the 45th section of the act really withdraws power formerly lodged with the corporate authorities. If the title did not have in it the words "for other purposes," there might be some plausibility, at least, in this contention; but the presence of the words just referred to, under the well-settled rule in this state, permits the general assembly to incorporate in the act legislation on any matter which is within the general purview of the act as indicated by the language of the title, although not referred to expressly therein. The general purview of the act under consideration is to amend, revise, and consolidate the several acts granting corporate authority to the city of Americus; and, under the right to amend and revise, the general assembly could take away any authority which had been formerly conferred upon the authorities of the city. See, in this connection, Macon v. Hughes, 110 Ga. 795, 36 S. E. 247; Welborne v. State, 114 Ga. 793 (5), 40 S. E. 857.

2. It is contended that the section of the city charter above referred to is invalid for the reason that the general assembly had no authority to appoint municipal officers, and that the exercise of the right by the legislature in this instance deprived the citizens of Americus of local self-government. The sections of the Constitution relied upon as granting the right of local self-government are the following clauses in the Bill of Rights: "All government, of right, originates with the people, is founded upon their will only, and is instituted solely for the good of the whole. Public officers are the trustees and servants of the people, and at all times amenable to them." Civil Code, § 5698. "The people of this state have the inherent, sole and exclusive right of regulating their internal government, and the police thereof, and of altering and abolishing their Constitution whenever it may be necessary for their safety and happiness." Civil Code, § 5734. "The enumeration of rights herein contained as a part of this Constitution shall not be construed to deny to the people any inherent rights which they may have hitherto enjoyed." Civil Code, § 5735. The propriety of creating municipal corporations, what powers shall be conferred upon them when created, the manner in which such powers shall be exercised, and the officers through whom the functions of government in such corporation shall be exercised, are all questions left by the Constitution, with few limitations and restrictions, to the wisdom and discretion of the general assembly. There is nothing in the Constitution restricting the authority of the general assembly in reference to naming the number and prescribing the authority and mode of appointment of the officers who shall administer the affairs of a municipal corporation created by it. All of these matters are left absolutely to its judgment. Whether the affairs of a municipal government shall be lodged in officers elected by the people of the municipality, or by officers appointed by the governor, or appointed or otherwise chosen by the general assembly, either by election, or by naming them in the act creating the municipal corporation, is a matter left to be determined by the general assembly in each instance according to the particular needs and peculiar conditions of the locality declared to be a municipal corporation. See, in this connection, Churchill v. Walker, 68 Ga. 681. The general assembly may, if it sees proper, intrust a portion of the powers of a municipal government to officers elected by the people of the municipality, and provide that other powers of government shall be exercised by officers named by the general assembly in the act providing for the exercise of such powers. See, in this connection, Americus Bd. of Public Edu. v. Barlow, 49 Ga. 232, in which the act of 1873 (Acts 1873, p. 109).

which named certain persons to constitute the board of education of the city of Americus, was held to be valid. There is nothing in the provisions of the Constitution above quoted, nor in any part of the Constitution, which in express terms prohibits the general assembly from either naming the officers who are to have the control of the affairs of a municipal corporation, or from prescribing the manner in which such officers are to be appointed; nor is there anything requiring that all or a portion of such officers shall be elected by the people of the municipality, and chosen in no other way. Neither is there anything in the Constitution, when construed as a whole, which by implication would deprive the general assembly of the right to deal with the matter of the appointment of the officers of a municipality in any manner that it deems best for the interest of the locality incorporated. There is not in the Constitution of this state any express guaranty of local self-government for municipal corporations. There is nothing in the Constitution from which this right can be legitimately inferred. How far a community shall be allowed to control its own affairs is left to the judgment and discretion of the general assembly. The fact that municipal corporations, prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1877, were given the right and were exercising the right to control their own affairs through officers chosen by them, would not prevent the general assembly from taking away this right; there being nothing in the Constitution which imperatively requires it to be construed as guaranteeing that this right of local self-government for municipal corporations shall exist absolutely in all cases. The right of the people of a municipal corporation to control its affairs is not an inherent right residing in the people, but is a right dependent for its existence upon legislative will, and how far they shall be given this right is a matter addressed solely to legislative discretion. See, in this connection, Diamond v. Cain, 21 La. Ann. 309; State ex rel. Atwood v. Hunter, 38 Kan. 578, 17 Pac. 177; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 102; Com. v. Plaisted, 148 Mass. 375, 2 L. R. A. 142, 19 N. E. 224; Baltimore v. State ex rel. Bd. of Police, 15 Md. 376, 74 Am. Dec. 572. We are aware that other courts of respectable standing have taken an entirely different view of this matter, and in some instances have held that the right of local self-government is an inherent right in the people of a municipality, and that the legislature cannot, in the absence of express authority in the Constitution, take away or impair this right in any material or substantial respect. See Evansville v. State ex rel. Blend, 118 Ind. 426, 4 L. R. A. 93, 21 N. E. 267, and cases cited; Rathbone v. Wirth, 150 N. Y. 459, 34 L. R. A. 408, 45 N. E. 15, and cases cited; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Moores, 55 Neb. 480, 41 L. R. A. 624, 78 N. W. 175, and cases cited; State ex rel. Jameson v. Denny, 118 Ind. 382, 4 L. R. A. 79, 21 N. E. 252. In some of the 57 L. R. A.

cases just referred to the ruling is based upon provisions in constitutions which expressly prohibit the legislature from interfering in the matter of the appointment of officers for municipal corporations; in others, language somewhat similar to the clause of our Constitution last above quoted is construed into a guaranty that the people of a municipal corporation should be permitted to exercise the same powers of local self-government which they were exercising at the time the Constitution was adopted; and in other cases, where there was nothing in the Constitution in relation to the subject, it was held that the right of local self-government was an inherent right, under American institutions, and that the right of the legislature to take it away would not be presumed unless there was in the Constitution a provision expressly authorizing the legislature to do so. We think the better view of this matter is that taken by Mitchell, J., in the dissenting opinion in the case of State ex rel. Jameson v. Denny, 118 Ind. 382, 4 L. R. A. 79, 21 N. E. 252, in the course of which he uses the following language: "The error which lies at the root of the argument by which the unconstitutionality of the acts here in question is attempted to be maintained, springs out of the fallacious assumption that the people of a city or town have any interest or inherent right whatever to municipal government, while every atom and vestige of right in those respects, under our system, are such, and only such, as the legislature confers. Upon this baseless assumption, which obliterates and confounds all distinctions between municipal regulation, a creation of legislation, and county and township government, which existed before legislatures were, and which is and always was common to every community in the state, the whole fabric of argument adverse to the constitutionality of these acts is built."

3. While the general assembly has authority to directly control the affairs of a municipal corporation, the legislative policy of this state has always been in favor of committing to local officers chosen by the people of the various municipalities all such powers of government as are in their nature purely local, and in the exercise of which persons residing at other places in the state are not directly, but only remotely, concerned. But there are some matters in connection with the management of a municipality in which the entire people of the state are more or less directly interested; and especially is this true in reference to any matter relating to the administration of public justice, and the preservation of the public tranquility, peace, and order. It has therefore not been unusual or uncommon for the general assembly either to take within its own control the administration of such affairs, through the medium of officers selected in other ways than by the voice of the people of the municipality, or to place such restrictions around the manner in which officers in charge of these affairs shall be chosen that the public peace and good order will be subserved, although to some extent withdrawing from the people of the municipality the right to directly choose such officers. In State ex rel. Atwood v. Hunter, 38 Kan. 578, 17 Pac. 177, Johnston, J., says: "Whatever may be said regarding the policy of placing the police administration of cities in a board of police commissioners, who are chosen by state officers, rather than through the electors of the cities, there can be no doubt that the legislature has the power to do so. The Constitution imposes no limitations upon the legislature in respect to the agencies through which the police power of the state shall be exercised. It may be conferred upon the officers of local municipalities chosen by the people resident therein, or, if deemed expedient, it may be vested in officers or persons otherwise selected. Cities are but agencies of the state, created to aid in the conduct of public affairs. The functions of cities and their officers are prescribed by the legislature, and it rests in the sovereign discretion of that body to say how much of the police power shall be exerted by the municipality. Although such power is usually exercised by the local authorities, police administration is not in its nature exclusively local. The people of the whole state are interested in preserving peace and good order and preventing crime in every city and district of the state, and in protecting the property, health, and lives of all its citizens." Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations, 4th ed. § 58, says: "The administration of justice, the preservation of the public peace, and the like, although confided to local agencies, are essentially matters of public concern." And in § 60 the author says: "And it has been several times determined that the legislature may, unless specially restricted in the Constitution, take from a municipal corporation its charter powers respecting the police and their appointment, and by statute itself directly provide for a permanent police for the corporation, under the control of a board of police not appointed or elected by the corporate authorities, but consisting of commissioners named and appointed by the legislature. Police officers are in fact state or public officers, and not private or corporate officers."

4. It is contended that the general assembly had no right to appoint the police commissioners by naming them in the act, and that, if it had a right to so appoint them, it had no right to provide that the commissioners thus named should have the power to fill vacancies in their own number; thus making the board a self-perpetuating body. It is insisted that the power of appointment to office is an executive power, and not legislative, and that under our Constitution (Civ. Code, § 5720), which provides that the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the government shall forever remain separate and distinct, and no person discharging the duties of one shall at the same time exercise the functions of the others, except as provided in the Constitution, the general assembly has no power to appoint officers for a municipal corporation; that power not being expressly given by the Constitution. While the Constitution declares that the three departments of government shall be separate and distinct, this separation is not, and from the nature of things, cannot, be total. See Beall v. Beall, 8 Ga. 212 (19). While the power to appoint public officers is in a great many instances lodged in some officer of the executive department, this is not now, and never has been, true in reference to all public officers. The history of this state will show that public officers have been chosen by the general assembly and also have been chosen by various judicial officers of the state. This court has, and always has had, the power to appoint its own officers, and a similar power is vested in the judges of many inferior tribunals. There is nothing in the legislative or judicial history of this state which would indicate that the power of appointment to office was to be treated as purely executive in its nature. An examination of the acts passed by the general assembly from the earliest history of the state down to the present time will show that in many instances the power to appoint officers has never been vested exclusively in the executive department, but has been from time to time vested in the judicial department, and has been exercised, directly or indirectly, by the legislative department; and there are many instances of legislation where powers apparently belonging to one department have been held properly exercisable by another department, for the reason, as stated in Beall v. Beall, that the separation of the three departments cannot, from the nature of things, be total. See, in this connection, Wilson v. State, 69 Ga. 224; Johnson v. Jackson, 99 Ga. 389, 27 S. E. 734; Bowen v. Clifton, 105 Ga. 459, 31 S. E. 147; Phinizy v. Eve, 108 Ga. 360, 33 S. E. 1007; Baltimore v. State ex rel. Bd. of Police, 15 Md. 376, 74 Am. Dec. 572; Americus Bd. of Public Edu. v. Barlow, 49 Ga. 232. If the general assembly may exercise the power to appoint an officer by providing the manner in which such officer shall be chosen, we see no good reason why it cannot exercise this power directly, by naming the officer in the act creating the office. The power to create the office and the power to provide for the filling of the office by appointment carry with them, not only the authority to name the person who shall be the officer, but also the power to provide how his successor shall be appointed; and the method of the selection of a successor to an officer whose duties are connected with the administration of the affairs of a municipal government is, like all other matters in relation to the affairs of such corporation, entirely within the control of the general assembly. If, in their judgment, in a particular case, the persons named by them as officers in charge of a particular duty are proper persons to be intrusted with the choice of their own successors, there is nothing in the Constitution of this state to prevent the general assembly from so providing, although so doing has the effect of making the board of municipal officers thus created a self-perpetuating body. Whether this is wise or proper or expedient is to be determined by the general assembly according to the circumstances of each case. It is a matter with which the courts have no concern, and in which they cannot interfere.

5. It is said that, even if § 45 of the charter is a valid provision of law, still, under § 43, the mayor and council have authority to appoint a police force to assist the marshal in the discharge of his duties. Americus City Code (1900) pp. 17, 18, § 43, confers upon the mayor and council the usual corporate powers in reference to streets, sidewalks, drains, etc.; the power to regulate markets, to abate nuisances, to regulate the keeping of gunpowder and other combustibles, to provide places for the burial of the dead, to provide and regulate a city market, to make regulations in reference to danger or damage by fire, to protect the property and persons of the citizens, and to preserve peace and good order in the city. The section then provides that the authorities have power "for this purpose to appoint when necessary a police force to assist the marshal in the discharge of his duty; to prescribe the powers and define the duties of the officers appointed by the mayor and council of Americus, to fix their terms of office and compensation," etc. If the charter had not contained § 45, in reference to the board of police commissioners, the language of § 43 might be sufficient to give the mayor and council absolute control in regard to the matter of police; but the two provisions of the charter are to be construed together, and as, under § 45, the board of police commissioners is given exclusive control of the matter of police, the power of the mayor and council in reference to the police, if it exists at all under § 43, is subordinate to the authority of the board of police commissioners; and, so long as the board discharges the duties imposed upon it by the statute and proper ordinances of the city, the mayor and council have no control whatever over the police of the city under the provisions of § 43, for the simple reason that the right to exercise any authority under that section is conferred only whenever it becomes necessary, and the necessity for the exercise of this power can never arise so long as the board of police commissioners is discharging its duties, and the mayor and council are providing moneys which are necessary for such board to efficiently discharge the duties imposed upon it by law. Taking the charter as a whole, it was the intention and purpose, and evidently in the contemplation, of the general assembly, that the mayor and council and the board of police commissioners should co-operate with each other in a common purpose to preserve the peace and good order of the city by providing an efficient police force; and it was never for a moment contemplated that the limited authority given to the mayor and council in reference to the police force should ever be used to obstruct the board of police commissioners in the discharge of its duty,—much less, to abrogate entirely the authority of that board. The mayor and council have a right, under the charter, to provide a police force for the city to assist the marshal whenever the necessity arises, but the mayor and council must not themselves bring about this necessity. The necessity for their action must arise from the fact that for some reason, independent of the action of the mayor and council, a condition of affairs has arisen where the board of police commissioners has failed or refused to discharge the duties imposed upon it, or a peculiar condition of affairs has arisen, where for the time being and temporarily the police force selected by the board of police commissioners is not adequate for the preservation of peace and order in the community. The charter does not contemplate that the mayor and council shall ever take such action as will render inefficient that department of the municipal government represented by the board of police commissioners. The mayor and council can exercise no power under § 43 of the charter except in that extreme case, that might, but probably will never, arise, where, after the mayor and council have done all that the charter requires in reference to the police and their compensation, the board of police commissioners fails or refuses to discharge the duties incumbent upon it. A cordial co-operation between the mayor and council and the board of police commissioners can have but one result, and that is an efficient police force in the city of Americus, and such co-operation and such a result were intended to be accomplished by the charter provisions. It was never for one moment contemplated by the general assembly that the mayor and council should impede or obstruct the board of police commissioners in the proper discharge of their duties, nor that, under the provisions of § 43 of the charter, the mayor and council should repeal § 45; and this is really what is attempted by the ordinances under review in this case.

6. It is said though that even if it be conceded that the action of the mayor and council is illegal, and they had no authority to pass the ordinances, a court of equity will not interfere in the matter, for the simple reason that the only question arising is as to who would be the lawful police officers of the city, and this is a matter that can be settled by a court of law by quo warranto or other legal proceeding. While equity will not enjoin the action of a municipal corporation while proceeding within the limits of its well-defined powers, it has jurisdiction to restrain acts in excess of this authority, and to enjoin acts which are ultra vires. The petition charges that the mayor and council have passed ordinances which, in effect, abolish the board of police commissioners altogether, and have by ordinance provided for a complete police force, headed by the marshal of the city, and that they are attempting to carry these ordinances into execution, and have up to the present time so far carried them into execution as that the mayer has refused, and still refuses, to recognize the chief of police elected by the board of police commissioners as a police officer of the city. The ordinances, so far as they attempt to abolish the board of police commissioners, and to deprive it of the powers which the charter conferred upon it, are ultra vires and void; and there is nothing in the petition to show that the board of police commissioners is either failing or refusing to exercise the powers confided to it by the general assembly. On the other hand, it appears, not only from the answer, but from the petition itself, that the board is attempting to exercise those very powers, and would exercise them but for the obstructions placed in its way by the mayor and council. Under such circumstances, the mayor and council have no authority whatever to elect a police force, and the election of such officers would bring about the question as to whether the persons so elected were entitled to demand compensation from the city; and while, under the view we have taken of the case, such persons would have no right to receive compensation, the fact that they were elected and were attempting to discharge the duties of the offices for which they were chosen would result either in the money in the city treasury being illegally used in paying their claims, or in requiring the money of the municipality to be used in defeating their claims for compensation; and, to prevent this, any taxpayer would have a right to appeal to a court of equity to enjoin the mayor and council from proceeding further to do any act which would have the effect to bring about either result. The plaintiffs bring their petition, not only as members of the board of police commissioners, but also in their capacity of citizens and taxpayers, and in this latter capacity they are entitled to be heard; the case made being one where the municipal authorities are going beyond their powers, and doing acts which, if carried into effect, would either result in a misappropriation of public funds, or entail upon the taxpayers of the city the expense of litigating with persons who might hold claims against the city under the invalid ordinances. See, in this connection, Macon v. Hughes, 110 Ga. 804, 36 S. E. 247, and cases cited; Mitchell v. Lasseter, 114 Ga. 275, 40 S. E. 287, and cases cited; 2 High, Inj. 3d ed. §§ 1236, 1241, 1243.

7. There are other questions raised by the demurrer and answer, but the above, we think, disposes of all such as are of a character which require discussion. No sufficient cause was shown, either by the demurrer or answer, why the injunction prayed for should not be granted, and the court did not err in granting the same.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concurred, except Little, J., absent on account of sickness.

In an action brought by a property owner against a railroad company to recover damages for depreciating the market value of his property caused by the construction and operation of a railroad, the measure of damages, under the Constitution of 1870, is the difference in value of the property before and after the acts complained of, and if there is no difference he has sustained no damage for which he can expect compensation.

Evidence of any interference with an abutting property owner's easements of light and air in a street is admissible in a suit of this character to aid the jury in determining whether or not the market value of the property has been depreciated by the construction and operation of the railroad.

Closely connected with the easement of light and air which an abutting property owner has in the street, is the right to an unobstructed view therein. Evidence of any interference with this right, caused by the construction and operation of a railroad, is properly admitted, in this kind of a suit, to aid the jury in determining whether or not the property has been depreciated by the construction and operation of the railroad.

Evidence of the vibration of neighboring property caused by the operation of a railroad is admissible to aid the jury in determining whether or not the market value thereof has been depreciated by such operation. There can also be no doubt of the liability for all actual physical damage sustained, such as the cracking of walls.

The courts of this state have sustained the admission of evidence of noise made by the operation of a railroad in suits brought by abutting property owners to recover damages for depreciating the value of their property, to assist the jury in determining whether or not the market value thereof has been affected by the construction and operation of the road.

The courts of other states having constitutional provisions similar to those of Illinois hold that evidence of noise made by the ordinary operation of a railroad is admissible, as an aid in the determination of whether or not the market value of property has been decreased, where damages are sought to be recovered upon this theory.

In the absence of satisfaction having been made by a railroad company for the servitude which it imposes upon neighboring property, the contention that it may, with impunity, do all acts upon land acquired by it under the power of eminent domain which an individual may exercise in relation to his property, without becoming liable to a neighboring property owner who is injured thereby, is unsound under the Illinois Constitution of 1870.

Property, in its appropriate sense, means that dominion or indefinite right of user and disposition which one may lawfully exercise over particular things or subjects, and generally the exclusion of all others; and doubtless this is substantially the sense in which it is used in the Constitution.

If property consists, not in tangible things themselves, but in certain rights in and appurtenant to those things, it follows that, when a person is deprived of any of those rights, he is to that extent deprived of his property, and hence, that his property may be taken, in the constitutional sense, though his title and possession remain undisturbed.

The Constitution of 1870 placed a public or quasi public corporation upon the same footing with relation to the use of its property as that of a private property owner, with respect to other property in the neighborhood. That is, its liability is the same, under the Constitution of 1870, as that of a private owner, at common law.

Under the Constitution of 1870, there must be physical interference either with the land or some right growing out of or connected with the land, which the owner enjoys in connection with his property, and which gives to it an additional value.

Mere inconvenience in the use of property caused by the proximity of a public improvement forms no basis of a recovery for damage, even though the property may be lessened in value.

The noise necessary to the operation of a railroad is a mere inconvenience to persons, and is not an interference with a property right growing out of the land.

Where the damage is the same in kind, only differing in degree from that suffered by the general public, there can be no recovery by a private individual.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the plaintiff below from a judgment of the circuit court rendered in bar of her action and for costs. The question presented involves the construction of the 1st clause of § 13 of article 2 of the Constitution: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation." In 1888 the plaintiff, owning two lots fronting west on Ashland boulevard, in Chicago, erected thereon an expensive apartment building. In 1892 the defendant below obtained, by purchase and condemnation, a right of way running east and west through the same block, and located and thereafter constructed on such right of way north of plaintiff's premises its elevated railway, and has since 1895 run its cars on said railway, propelled by electricity, crossing Ashland boulevard 31 feet north of plaintiff's building. The road consists of four tracks on a steel structure elevated 14½ feet from the ground, over which 1,554 trains, of from three to five cars each, pass plaintiff's property and cross the boulevard daily. To recover damages to her property caused by the construction and operation of defendant's road the plaintiff brought this action, and as grounds of recovery alleged in the first count of her declaration that by the construction and operation of the road the street is darkened, the light cut off from her house, the view down the boulevard obstructed, and the entrance to the premises interfered with and rendered unsafe. The second count charges that on account of the darkening of the boulevard and the running of trains over it the premises are deprived of air, ventilation, and quiet, passage along the boulevard to and from the premises has been and is interrupted, and access thereto has been impaired, and the soil and buildings are disturbed, vibrated, shaken, and damaged, and trains are operated over the structure with great noise, caused by rumbling and squeaking of wheels, and other noises connected with the operation of an elevated railroad, so as continually to disturb and destroy the peace and quiet of the premises. The third count charges that the appellee is a railway corporation authorized by the laws of this state to take and damage private property necessary for the construction and operation of its road upon making just compensation therefor, and that it has constructed and is operating its road within 19 feet of appellant's property, and has damaged it in the sum of $20,000, but has made her no compensation, as required by the Constitution and laws of Illinois. To this declaration the appellee pleaded the general issue. Upon the trial the court excluded the evidence, and directed the jury to find defendant not guilty.

There was no charge or proof that the road was negligently constructed or operated, but only that by the construction and operation of the road so near to appellant's property, and across the public street there, her property was damaged for public use, within the meaning of the Constitution, for which no compensation has been made, and for which she is entitled to recover. The road was located and constructed by the company in accordance with lawful authority, and upon its own land or right of way, and not in any public street or alley, except where it crosses streets or alleys by authority lawfully granted. For the purposes of this case it must be assumed, from the record, that it was carefully constructed and carefully operated, and that by such construction and operation it did not injuriously affect the property of others, or the property in question of the plaintiff, any more than any such property would be affected in any case by the construction and operation of such a road so near to such property. Ashland boulevard, running north and south in front of plaintiff's property, was 100 feet wide, and had been paved and beautified as a residence street. Congress street runs east and west 50 feet south of plaintiff's premises, there being another building between plaintiff's and Congress street. The record shows that no unusual noise or vibration of plaintiff's property was caused by the company in the matter complained of. Access to her property from any public street or alley was not cut off or injuriously affected. In short, whatever damages were sustained by the plaintiff were such, and only such, as were common to the public generally.

In Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64, this court allowed a recovery against the city for damages to the plaintiff's property caused by the construction of a viaduct, on the ground that it cut off access from the public street to plaintiff's property. In that case the court discussed the rule at common law, and said (p. 70): "It is a well-recognized principle that where a thing not malum in se is authorized to be done by a valid act of the legislature, and it is performed with due care and skill, in strict conformity with the provisions of the act, its performance cannot, by the common law, be made the ground of an action, however much one may be injured by it,"—citing cases. And further said, in substance, that under the Constitution of 1848, which prohibited the taking of private property for public use without just compensation, any actual physical invasion or direct physical injury to property in such cases was regarded as a taking. Then, after a further discussion of the question at issue in that case and a review of previous cases, it was further said (p. 80): "The question then recurs, What additional class of cases did the framers of the new Constitution intend to provide for which are not embraced in the old? While it is clear that the present Constitution was intended to afford redress in a certain class of cases for which there was no remedy under the old Constitution, yet we think it equally clear that it was not intended to reach every possible injury that might be occasioned by a public improvement. There are certain injuries which are necessarily incident to the ownership of property in towns or cities, which directly impair the value of private property, for which the law does not and never has afforded any relief. For instance, the building of a jail, police station, or the like will generally cause a direct depreciation in the value of neighboring property, yet that is clearly a case of damnum absque injuria. So as to an obstruction in a public street,—if it does not practically affect the use or enjoyment of neighboring property, and thereby impair its value, no action will lie. In all cases, to warrant a recovery it must appear there has been some direct physical disturbance of a right, either public or private, which the plaintiff enjoys in connection with his property, and which gives to it an additional value, and that by reason of such disturbance he has sustained a special damage with respect to his property in excess of that sustained by the public generally. In the absence of any statutory or constitutional provisions on the subject the common law afforded redress in all such cases, and we have no doubt it was the intention of the framers of the present Constitution to require compensation to be made in all cases where, but for some legislative enactment, an action would lie by the common law."

That case, ever since its decision, has been regarded as laying down the proper rule on the subject, and is, we think, conclusive of the case at bar. Here there has been no direct physical disturbance of any right, public or private, which the plaintiff enjoys in connection with her property, and which gives to it an additional value, whereby she has sustained a special damage in excess of that sustained by the public generally. The damages sued for are of the same kind and character as those sustained by the public generally in the ownership of property, which property may have been lessened in value by the construction and operation of the road. Noise, the obstruction of light and of view, are necessary incidents of the construction and operation of such roads, and if every property owner could recover in all such cases the making of public improvements would become practically impossible. This road is not constructed along the street in front of the plaintiff's property, thus injuring or destroying a public right which she enjoyed in connection with her property, but, as before said, it is constructed on its own land or right of way. Therefore, what the rights of an abutter would be in such a case it is not necessary to consider. In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Grabill, 50 Ill. 241, in speaking of the annoyances of running engines, the escape of steam, etc., near the plaintiff's premises, this court said (p. 244): "Such consequences of the construction and use of railroads must be borne by all living near them, without complaint and without hope of redress, for they are inseparable from the purposes and objects of such structures, but that a recovery can and should be had for such damages as arise out of the careless and negligent acts of a railroad company in regard to any usual and necessary appurtenance to their road cannot be denied." Chicago v. Union Stock Yards & Transit Co. 164 Ill. 224, 35 L. R. A. 281, 45 N. E. 430. A railroad constructed and operated by authority of law cannot be a nuisance, and there was no right of action at common law for the depreciation in value of property so caused. The company is liable for negligent or wilful injury, as others are, but not for doing the things which the law authorizes it to do. Nor can we agree that the Constitution of 1870 gives, or was intended to give, a remedy for all incidental losses, or for the depreciation of the value of property, caused by the construction and operation of railroads in the vicinity; but, as said in the Rigney Case, it was intended only to restore a remedy which existed at common law, but which had been denied by legislation and the Constitution of 1848.

We are referred to Chicago, P. & St. L. R. Co. v. Leah, 152 Ill. 249, 38 N. E. 556, and Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Darke, 148 Ill. 226, 35 N. E. 750, as announcing a different doctrine. There may be in the opinions in those cases some expressions which, considered alone and without reference to the cases there under consideration, might tend to support the views of counsel for appellant, but those decisions are in full accord with the Rigney Case and with this, and the Rigney Case was cited as authority in the Leah Case. In the latter case the premises of plaintiff had their front on a narrow street 20 feet in width, and the defendant's railroad crossed this street diagonally, opposite the plaintiff's premises, within 6½ feet thereof, and said street afforded the only approach to said premises. In that case it is clear that there was a direct physical disturbance of a public right which the plaintiff enjoyed in connection with his property, which right gave to it an additional value, and that he sustained special damages with respect to his property different from and in excess of that sustained by the public generally. While there may not have been a direct physical injury to the corpus of the property, there was such an injury to the owner's right of access to and use and enjoyment of the property which was not common to the public generally. So, too, in the Darke Case. While the road was not located in the pub-lie street, but on the company's right of way, yet the gravamen of the action was that cinders, ashes, and smoke were thrown and blown onto the plaintiff's premises in a considerable amount, and that the value of her premises was depreciated by that cause. It cannot, therefore, be said that there was no direct physical injury to the property, or of a right which she enjoyed therein, which caused special damages to her which were not suffered by others of the public generally in the use of their property. In the case at bar the trains were run by electricity, and it is not contended that there were thrown or deposited on the plaintiff's property any cinders or other material substances, nor that there was any unusual noise or vibration or jarring of the earth. Whatever damage plaintiff may have suffered in depreciation of the value of her property was of the same kind and character as that suffered by the public generally, and common to the owners of property in a large city, where noise, confusion, and the disturbance of quiet appear to be the necessary results of the activities of city life.

The proof admitted and that offered on the trial in this case would not sustain in full the allegations of the declaration, which in some of the counts stated a good cause of action, and what we have said is based upon the record as it stood on the trial of the case and as we have stated it to be. For example, there was no proof that entrance to plaintiff's premises from the street was interfered with or rendered unsafe.

The judgment will be affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

City of DES MOINES

v.

KELLER, Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. The title "An ordinance to Regulate Bicycles" is sufficient to cover a provision requiring the use of lamps by bicyclists using the streets of the city after dark.
2. An ordinance requiring bicycle riders to carry lamps is not unconstitutional because not applying to other silently running vehicles.
3. The equal privileges and immunities of a bicycle rider are not infringed by requiring him to carry a light after dark.
4. Authority to provide for the safety of its inhabitants will give a municipality power to require bicyclists using its streets after dark to carry lights.

(January 23, 1902.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County convicting him of violating an ordinance prohibiting the riding of bicycles after dark without carrying lights on them. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. E. Long for appellant.

Mr. M. H. Cohen for appellee.

Sherwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 2d day of July, 1894, the following ordinance was passed by the city council of Des Moines: "An Ordinance to Regulate Bicycles. . . . § 290. Riding without Light. That it shall be unlawful for any person to ride any bicycle upon the streets after dark and before daylight without carrying or having a sufficient light to be easily seen the distance of at least one block. Any person found guilty of violating this ordinance shall be fined not less than $1.00 nor more than $20.00, and stand committed to jail until such fine and costs are paid."

The title of this ordinance is expressed with sufficient clearness, and is broad enough to cover the use of bicycles on the streets of the city. Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. § 51; Morford v. Unger, 8 Iowa, 82; State ex rel. Witter v. Forkner, 94 Iowa, 1, 28 L. R. A. 206, 62 N. W. 772; State v. Barge, 82 Minn. 250, 53 L. R. A. 428, 84 N. W. 912, 1116.

Nor is the ordinance in conflict with and contrary to § 6 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state, because it applies only to bicycles, and not to riders or users of other silently running vehicles. It applies to all riders of bicycles, as a class, and is for this reason sufficient and reasonable. Iowa R. Land Co. v. Soper, 39 Iowa, 112; Primghar State Bank v. Rerick, 96 Iowa, 238, 64 N. W. 801. In the early history of bicycles, some of the courts were inclined to the view that they were such an innovation on the use of the highways that they were not entitled to the same protection as other vehicles. See State v. Yopp, 97 N. C. 477, 2 S. E. 458. But they are now generally treated as vehicles having a common right to the use of the streets and highways. See Taylor v. Union Traction Co. (Pa.) 47 L. R. A. 289, note. And they are subject to all just and reasonable requirements for the safety and convenience of other users of such streets and highways. That a municipal corporation has absolute control of its streets is generally conceded, and it is equally as true that it may enact such ordinances governing the use thereof as shall be necessary, in its judgment, to protect the public, providing they are reasonable; and if it does this without undue discrimination, and all who are subject to the ordinance are treated alike, under similar circumstances and conditions, as to privileges conferred and liabilities imposed, equal protection of the laws is not denied. The noiseless, swift, and light character of a bicycle distinguishes it from all other vehicles used on the highways. In the night, on a paved street, it is as silent as death. It glides along without any of the noise made by horses drawing a carriage. Its approach is generally unheralded, and pedestrians who are called upon to cross a street are usually without warning of its proximity until a "swish" advises them that it has passed. That vehicles that are more dangerous to the public than others may be regulated by ordinance, we do not doubt; and a requirement that bicycle riders use lamps during the night is but a just and reasonable exercise of control over the public highways for the protection of others whose rights thereon are as great as theirs. Tricycles, quadricycles, and rubber-tired buggies are not of the same class as bicycles. Wheeler v. Boone, 108 Iowa, 235, 44 L. R. A. 821, 78 N. W. 909.

Nor do we think the ordinance in question inhibited by § 1 of article 14 of the Constitution of the United States. The privilege of using a public street is always to be regulated so as to protect the equal rights of others.

We are clearly of the opinion that the council had implied, if not direct, power to pass an ordinance regulating the use of its streets by vehicles before § 754 of the Code of 1897 was passed. Under § 482 of the Code of 1873, it had power to provide for the safety of its inhabitants, and it must be conceded that this is the only purpose of the ordinance in question.

The judgment is affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

The right of local self-government is the right of the individual citizen; it does not belong to the state or towns, counties or cities, but to the individual, to the people.

The right of local self-government in towns and cities is vested in the people of the respective municipalities, and the legislature cannot appoint officers to administer municipal affairs, and hence cannot confer the power upon any other person, this power ending with the enactment of laws prescribing the manner of selection and the duties of the officers.

A municipal corporation, though a public and political institution, deriving its life and powers from the state, possesses a private and proprietary character, and, as such, may acquire and hold property by the same constitutional guaranties that extend over natural persons, and the restriction upon legislative action impairing the obligation of contracts preserves those made with it. Rights held by it in its last-named character are beyond legislative control and interference.

The provision requiring the district court to appoint the members of the board of trustees does not conflict with the Constitution.

The trustees are not "officers," but are mere "agents," representing the municipality within the powers conferred by the legislature.

Courts of equity, in their general jurisdiction, are peculiarly adapted to look after trust estates, and it is a maxim that no trust estate shall suffer for want of a trustee.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The 26th, 27th, and 28th general assemblies passed acts creating a board of waterworks trustees for cities of the first class, and authorizing the appointment of such board by the district court of the county in which such cities are located. Vide, §§ 742 and 750, inclusive, of the Code; Acts 27th Gen. Assem. chap. 23, and Acts 28th Gen. Assem. chap. 25. Sioux City is a city of the first class, and has owned and operated its waterworks system since the year 1885. In the year 1898 the then mayor made application to the district court of Woodbury county for the appointment of a board of trustees for the system, under the provisions of the acts of the legislature hitherto mentioned. Pursuant to this application, the four judges of the fourth judicial district, in which Woodbury county is situated, met in Sioux City, and appointed the defendants as trustees of the system. Defendant Spaulding refused to serve, and defendant Allison was appointed in his place. Three of the judges who participated in the conference and assisted in the selection of the trustees were and are nonresidents of Woodbury county, but the other was and is a resident of Sioux City. The persons so appointed filed bond in a sum fixed by the district court, and at once assumed control of the waterworks system, entered upon the discharge of their duties, and have since been in the exclusive possession, control, and management of the system. The relator is a resident citizen and taxpayer of the city of Sioux City, and a contributor to the support of the waterworks system. Intervener was, on the third Monday of March in the year 1899, appointed by the city council of the city of Sioux City to the office of superintendent of the waterworks system. He duly qualified as such, and he and the plaintiff, before the commencement of this proceeding, each made demand on the county attorney, to bring action to test the validity of the defendants' appointment, and the constitutionality of the acts under which the appointments were made. The city council also passed a resolution authorizing the commencement of the action. As the county attorney refused to bring the suit, the relator commenced it, and Robson, the superintendent appointed by the council, intervened, and asked the same relief as relator. Such, in brief, is a statement of the more important facts in the case, and the questions of law involved are so well stated by appellees' counsel that we use them as a basis for this opinion. They are as follows: "First. Has the legislature of Iowa the constitutional power to take away from the city council the control and management of the waterworks, and place such control and management in a board of trustees? Second. Assuming that the legislature has such power, are the acts of the legislature in question unconstitutional by reason of the manner of the execution of the power? In other words, Do the provisions placing the power of appointment of the members of the board of trustees with the district court of Woodbury county infringe any provision of the Constitution? Third. Has Win S. White such an interest in the questions involved as will enable the court to render judgment in this case upon the merits thereof?"

As the third proposition involves a question of practice, it is perhaps well to settle that before proceeding with the merits of the case. Section 4316 of the Code, relating to quo warranto proceedings, reads as follows: "Sec. 4316. By Private Persons. If the county attorney, on demand, neglects or refuses to commence the same, any citizen of the state having an interest in the question may apply to the court in which the action is to be commenced, or to the judge thereof, for leave to do so, and, upon obtaining such leave may bring and prosecute the action to final judgment." It is admitted that the county attorney refused to bring the action, and the only question for decision on this branch of the case is, Has the relator such an interest in the question as that he may apply to the court for leave to do so? We think he has such interest. A private citizen and taxpayer is undoubtedly interested in the duties annexed to the several public officials who are authorized to levy taxes. This is not a contest over an office, as were many of the cases cited in appellees' brief, but a matter of public interest, in which relator has a special interest by reason of being a contributor to the funds. State ex rel. West v. Des Moines, 96 Iowa, 521, 31 L. R. A. 186, 65 N. W. 818; Cochran v. McCleary, 22 Iowa, 75; State v. Independent School Dist. 29 Iowa, 284; *State ex rel. Phillips v. Fidelity & Co. W. 822; State ex rel. West v. Des Moines, 96 Iowa, 521, 31 L. R. A. 186, 65 N. W. 818, is conclusive of the point. As we have said, if this were a contest over the right to hold office, relator should have shown that he was elected or appointed to that office; or, if it had been an action to dissolve the corporation, perhaps he could not have maintained the suit. But it is neither, and under our statute there seems to be no doubt of his right to sue. In any event, the intervener was entitled to maintain the action, because he had been appointed to the office of superintendent of the system pursuant to an ordinance adopted by the city. See, as further sustaining our conclusions on this point: Darrow v. People, 8 Colo. 417, 8 Pac. 661; Churchill v. Walker, 68 Ga. 691; State ex rel. Waterbury v. Martin, 46 Conn. 479; Taggart ex rel. Jackson v. James, 73 Mich. 234, 41 N. W. 262; Com. ex rel. Yard v. Meeser, 44 Pa. 341; People ex rel. Barton v. Londoner, 13 Colo. 303, 6 L. R. A. 444, 22 Pac. 764.

The other points presented involve constitutional questions that, to some extent at least, are new to the courts of this state. Preliminary to a discussion of the propositions involved, it is well to determine the powers, duties and functions of a municipal corporation. Judge Dillon, in his masterly work on such corporations, gives an interesting and exhaustive history of their origin, growth, and development. Within the limits of a judicial opinion it is manifestly impossible to do more than state in the most general way some well-established historical facts regarding the development of municipalities. Man has ever been gregarious by nature, and, emerging from a state of barbarism, he naturally sought the society and fellowship of his kind. Rude gatherings and somewhat formless centers of population were the result, and from these were evolved better forms of organization and higher degrees of compactness, until even in remote antiquity great cities were established, which could only have been maintained by a system of municipal government, crude and incomplete at first, but certainly by no means contemptible. The storied splendors of the prehistoric cities of the old and new world are not wholly mythical. Indeed, the general trend has been from the unorganized to the organized; from the protoplasmic to the more complex and higher and more efficient forms of life. In the early Hellenic civilization the city was the state, governed in general by the whole body of free citizens, who met and discussed all questions of policy. The history of Rome is simply an account of the greatest municipal corporation the world has ever seen. The Roman republic took its origin from the city of the Tiber, and was but a development and extension of that city; and the empire erected on its foundations was remarkable for the power, influence, and wealth of the municipalities. During the dark ages the cities preserved what was left of knowledge, culture, and art. With the dawn of the Renaissance came Christianity and the feudal system, and the castle of the baron became the unit of government. The germ of the municipal corporation in England is to be traced to the "farmer commonwealths" of the early Teutons, and each "wick," "ham," "stead," or "tun," took its name from the kinsmen who dwelt together therein. "Each, judged by witness of the kinsfolk, made laws in the assembly of its freeman, chose leaders for its governance, and the men who were to follow headman or ealderman to hundred, court, or war." Green's Short History of English People, p. 15, § 2; Id. p. 93, § 6; Ang. & A. Priv. Corp. § 21. As to the growth of English guilds and boroughs, see Dill. Mun. Corp. chap. 1; 3 Hall. Middle Ages, chap. 8; and Green's History, chap. 4. Our own towns were established in accordance with the English principles of liberty, but they generally possess greater powers of local self-government than their English prototypes; and, as said by Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations (p. 223): "In contradistinction to those governments where power is concentrated in one man, or in one or more bodies of men, whose supervision and active control extends to all the objects of government within the territorial limits of the state, the American system is one of complete decentralization, the primary and vital idea of which is that local affairs shall be managed by local authorities, and general affairs only by the central authority." See also De Toqueville on Democracy in America, tome 1, 64, 96, wherein it is said that municipal corporations form the principle of American liberty existing to this day. The history of New England towns is quite generally understood, and we need only cite the following cases for an epitome of their origin and powers: Warren v. Charleston, 2 Gray, 84; Bloomfield v. Charter Oak Nat. Bank, 121 U. S. 121, 30 L. ed. 923, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865; Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332; Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 28-30; and Local Constitutional History of the United States by George F. Howard (vol. 1, chap. 2). The result of all this discussion is a definition of the term as follows: "We may, therefore, define a municipal corporation in its historical and strict sense to be the incorporation by the authority of the government of the inhabitants of a particular place or district, and authorizing them in their corporate capacity to exercise subordinate specified powers of legislation and regulation with respect to their local and internal concerns. This power of local government is the distinctive purpose and the distinguishing feature of a municipal corporation proper." Dill. Mun. Corp. § 20. The only fault with this definition, if there be any, is that it does not embrace the inhabitants as well as the territory, for the term embraces both the territory and its inhabitants. Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 104 U. S. 78, 26 L. ed. 658; Galesburg v. Hawkinson, 75 Ill. 156. Under our form of government the legislature creates municipal corporations, defines and limits their powers, enlarges or diminishes them at will, points out the agencies which are to execute them, and possesses such general supervision over them as it shall deem proper and needful for the public welfare. As to all matters of public concern, such as relate to the performance by the city of functions as an agent of the state, the legislature is unlimited in its power. State ex rel. Hawes v. Mason, 153 Mo. 23, 54 S. W. 524; People ex rel. Drake v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481. Neither the charter of a municipal corporation nor any legislative act regulating the use of property held by it for governmental purposes is a contract within the meaning of the constitutional inhibition of laws impairing the obligations of contracts, and where there is no constitutional restriction, either express or implied, upon the action of the legislature, it has absolute control to create, change, modify, or destroy such corporations at pleasure. Covington v. Kentucky, 173 U. S. 231, 43 L. ed. 679, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383; Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S. 472, 26 L. ed. 197; St. Louis v. Shields, 52 Mo. 351; Mount Pleasant v. Beckwith, 100 U. S. 514, 25 L. ed. 699. But the legislative control of municipal corporations is not without limitations. This immunity from unlimited legislative control has been expressly recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States in New Orleans v. New Orleans Waterworks Co. 142 U. S. 79, 35 L. ed. 943, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 142, where it is said "that the municipality, being a mere agent of the state, stands in its governmental or public character in no contract relation with its sovereign, at whose pleasure its charter may be amended, changed, or revoked without the impairment of any constitutional obligation, while with respect to its private or proprietary rights and interests it may be entitled to the constitutional protection." The dual capacity of such a corporation has long been recognized; in other words, it is in part a public agency of the state, and in part possessed of local franchises and rights, which pertain to it as a legal entity for its corporate advantage. The right of a municipal corporation to hold and manage property, to sue and to be sued, and to act generally as a private corporation in supplying local needs and conveniences, has been distinctly recognized by a long line of well-considered cases. Western Sav. Fund Soc. v. Philadelphia, 31 Pa. 175, 72 Am. Dec. 730; People ex rel. Park Comrs. v. Detroit, 28 Mich. 229, 15 Am. Rep. 202; People ex rel. Le Roy v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 9 Am. Corp.* § 28; Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank v. Arkansas City, 34 L. R. A. 518, 22 C. C. A. 171, 40 U. S. App. 257, 76 Fed. 271; People ex rel. McCagg v. Chicago, 51 Ill. 17, 2 Am. Rep. 278; Davock v. Moore, 105 Mich. 120, 28 L. R. A. 783, 63 N. W. 424; State ex rel. Atwood v. Hunter, 38 Kan. 578, 17 Pac. 177; State ex rel. Terre Haute v. Kolsem, 130 Ind. 434, 14 L. R. A. 566, 29 N. E. 595; Wagner v. Rock Island, 146 Ill. 139, 21 L. R. A. 519, 34 N. E. 545. Some of the cases cited proceed on the theory that the legislature has no power, after creating a municipal corporation, to take away from it the right of local self-government. The argument is that the intention to preserve and perpetuate the ancient right of local self-government, which the law recognizes as of common-law origin, and having no less than common-law franchises, is apparent throughout the scope of most American constitutions. Some of the judges even go so far as to say "that, local self-government having always been a part of the English and American systems, we shall look for its recognition in any such instrument [constitution]; and, if not expressly recognized, it is still to be understood that all these instruments are framed with its present existence and anticipated continuance in view;" "that back of all constitutions are certain usages and maxims that have sprung from the habits of life, mode of thought, methods of trying facts, and mutual responsibility in neighborhood interests; precepts that have come from revolutions which overturned tyrannies; sentiments of manly independence and self-control, which impelled our ancestors to summon the local community to redress local evils, instead of relying upon King or legislature at a distance to do so; that form the living spirit of the lifeless skeleton known as the constitution; that gives it force and attraction, and that distinguishes it from the numberless so-called constitutions of Europe; and that this so-called living spirit should supply the interpretation of the words of the written charter." We are not to be understood as fully approving all that is said in some of the cases regarding the right of local self-government, nor do we mean to hold that there is an unwritten constitution complete and comprehensive in itself. All that we intend to announce is that written constitutions should be construed with reference to and in the light of well-recognized and fundamental principles lying back of all constitutions, and constituting the very warp and woof of these fabrics. A law may be within the inhibition of the Constitution as well by implication as by expression. Page v. Allen, 58 Pa. 338, 98 Am. Dec. 272; People ex rel. Ford v. Gillette, 159 N. Y. 125, 53 N. E. 755; Bailey v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 4 Harr. (Del.) 389, 44 Am. Dec. 593. But we will not elaborate this thought. Suffice it to say that we have already recognized the principles announced in State ex rel. Howe v. Des Moines, 103 Iowa, 76, 39 L. R. A. 285, 72 N. W. 639, wherein it was held, after referring with approval to many of the cases we have cited, that the legislature could not delegate the power of municipal taxation to a board not elected by and immediately responsible to the people to be affected thereby. This court, speaking through Kinne, J., said there was an implied limitation on the power of the legislature to delegate the power of taxation. Right of local self-government was also recognized in State ex rel. Witter v. Forkner, 94 Iowa, 1, 28 L. R. A. 206, 62 N. W. 772. Section 25 of article 1 of the Constitution provides that "this enumeration of rights shall not be construed to impair or deny others retained by the people." Some of the cases we have cited hold to the doctrine that the rights of the inhabitants of a municipal corporation to local self-government is one of the rights retained by the people. But we need not and do not go to this extent, except in so far as private and proprietary rights and interests are concerned, as will hereinafter appear. Municipal corporations are recognized by the Constitution, and certain limitations placed on the power of the legislature with reference thereto. Thus it is provided that "no corporation shall be created by special laws, but the general assembly shall provide by general laws for the organization of all corporations hereafter to be created." Section 1, art. 8. Section 12 of the same article, authorizing the repeal or amendment of all laws relating to corporations, has no application to municipal corporations. Ex parte Pritz, 9 Iowa, 30. Section 30 of article 3 prohibits the passage of local or special laws for the incorporation of cities and towns. It thus appears that municipal corporations are recognized by our fundamental law, and that no special or local law relating thereto may be passed. We are also of opinion that there are other well-defined limits on the power of the legislature in dealing with such bodies. But we need not further elaborate on these points. Any other conclusion than the one we have reached would necessitate the overruling of the case in 103 Iowa, 76, 39 L. R. A. 285, 72 N. W. 639, and that we are not prepared to do.

2. There are other considerations, however, that lead to the same conclusion. We have already called attention to the dual nature of municipal corporations, and have discovered that with respect to private and proprietary rights and interests they are entitled to constitutional protection. It is quite clear that the establishment and control of waterworks for the benefit of the inhabitants of the city is a matter that pertains to the municipality, as distinguished from the state at large. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 58; Mount Hope Cemetery v. Boston, 158 Mass. 509, 33 N. E. 695; Western Sav. Fund Soc. v. Philadelphia, 31 Pa. 175, 72 Am. Dec. 730; Kansas City v. Marsh Oil Co. 140 Mo. 472, 41 S. W. 943. In Peterson v. Society for Establishing Useful Manufactures, 24 N. J. L. 385, it is held, in substance, that a municipal corporation exercising powers conferred not for public purposes, but for its private benefit and emolument, will be regarded quod hæc as a private corporation. See also Montpelier v. East Montpelier, 29 Vt. 12, 67 Am. Dec. 748; Atkins v. Randolph, 31 Vt. 226; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 694, 4 L. ed. 673; Detroit v. Detroit & H. Pl. Road Co. 43 Mich. 140, 5 N. W. 275; Helena Consol. Water Co. v. Steele, 20 Mont. 1, 37 L. R. A. 412, 49 Pac. 382; Newport v. Horton, 22 R. I. 196, 50 L. R. A. 330, 47 Atl. 312; Louisville v. University of Louisville, 15 B. Mon. 642; Milwaukee v. Milwaukee, 12 Wis. 94. Having, then, a proprietary and private interest in its waterworks system, granted to it by the legislature, or incident to its power to acquire and hold property, the question recurs, May the management and control of this property be taken out of its hands by the legislature, and invested in trustees appointed by the district court; especially where, as in this case, the trustees so appointed are in no respect responsible to the appointing power, and are not required to make reports thereto? We think not. If the city were a mere private corporation, it would need no argument to show that the legislature could not take the management of its property out of the hands of its officers and directors, and place it in the custody and control of officials, even if they be stockholders, selected by persons who had no interest in the corporate entity, and who were in no manner responsible to those interested in the welfare of the organization. Such divestiture of property, or, what is the same thing, of its management and control, would be unconstitutional and void. The same rules have been applied to property held by a municipal corporation in its private and proprietary capacity. See cases heretofore cited, and Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 68, 68a, 69; Orr v. Bracken County, 81 Ky. 593; Small v. Danville, 51 Me. 359; Western College of Homeopathic Medicine v. Cleveland, 12 Ohio St. 375; Oliver v. Worcester, 102 Mass. 489, 3 Am. Rep. 485; De Voss v. Richmond, 18 Gratt. 338, 98 Am. Dec. 647; Niles Waterworks v. Niles, 59 Mich. 311, 26 N. W. 525; Anne Arundel County v. Duckett, 20 Md. 468, 83 Am. Dec. 557, and cases heretofore cited. This view appears to us to be based on the soundest of reasons, and to be supported by the weight of authority. It is alone sufficient to dispose of the case, but there is another objection, even stronger than the ones we have been considering.

3. The division of the powers of government into three different departments—legislative, executive, and judicial—lies at the very foundation of our constitutional system. The fathers had in mind "Montesquieu's Dissertation on the Spirit of the Laws," in which he said: "There is no liberty if the power of judging be not separated from the legislative and executive powers when the legislative and executive powers are united in one body or person. There can be no liberty, because apprehensions may arise lest the same monarch or senate should enact tyrannical laws to execute them in a tyrannical manner." He further said: "Were the power of judging joined with the legislative, the life and liberty of the subject would be exposed to arbitrary control, for the judge would then be the legislator. Were it joined to the executive, the judge might behave with all the violence of an oppressor." Recognizing the dangers to be feared from concentration of power, our constitution builders not only created the three departments, but specially provided in § 1, art. 3, that "no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any function appertaining to either of the others, except in cases hereinafter expressly directed or permitted." The act in question authorizes the district court to appoint trustees for the waterworks system, and, strangely enough, requires the concurrence of more than one judge, failing to recognize that the district court can only be presided over by one judge. The appointment is to be made for a going concern, and without regard to dissensions or contests regarding the control or management of the system; and the inquiry naturally arises, Is this a judicial function? If it is, then the judiciary may be authorized, empowered, and required to select any or all municipal officers. In the further discussion of the question it must be borne in mind that the district court is created by the Constitution, and what is said has reference to a constitutional court. Courts which are not provided for by the Constitution may be authorized to discharge functions that are executive or legislative in character. Thus the county courts of this state, when they existed, not only were authorized to perform judicial functions, but executive and legislative as well. This is permissible under all the authorities. Stone v. Wilson, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 126, 39 S. W. 49; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. First Judicial Dist. Judges, 21 Ohio St. 1; Walker v. Cincinnati, 21 Ohio St. 14, 8 Am. Rep. 24; Phinizy v. Ewe, 108 Ga. 360, 33 S. E. 1007. But powers not in themselves judicial, and that are not to be exercised in the discharge of the functions of the judicial department, cannot be conferred on courts or judges designated by the Constitution as a part of the judicial department of the state. Hoyburn's Case, 2 Dall. 409, 1 L. ed. 436; United States v. Ferreira, 13 How. 40, 14 L. ed. 42; United States v. Todd, 13 How. 52, note, 14 L. ed. 47, note; Case of Election Supers. 114 Mass. 247, 19 Am. Rep. 341; Norwalk Street R. Co.'s Appeal, 69 Conn. 576, 39 L. R. A. 794, 37 Atl. 1080, 38 Atl. 708; Housman v. Montgomery, 58 Mich. 364, 25 N. W. 369; Smith v. Strother, 68 Cal. 194, 8 Pac. 852; Sterens v. Truman, 127 Cal. 155, 59 Pac. 397; People ex rel. Nichols v. McKee, 68 N. C. 429; State ex rel. Coogan v. Barbour, 53 Conn. 85, 55 Am. Rep. 65, 22 Atl. 686; Taylor v. Com. 3 J. J. Marsh. 401; State ex rel. Hahn v. Young, 29 Minn. 474, 9 N. W. 737; McRae v. Grand Rapids, L. & D. R. Co. 93 Mich. 399, 17 L. R. A. 750, 53 N. W. 561; Muhlenburg County v. Morehead, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 316, 46 S. W. 484; State ex rel. Board of Transportation v. Sioux City, O. & W. R. Co. 46 Neb. 682, 31 L. R. A. 47, 65 N. W. 766; Ex parte Griffiths, 118 Ind. 83, 3 L. R. A. 398, 20 N. E. 513; Rees v. Watertown, 19 Wall. 107, 22 L. ed. 72. Of course, the act itself need not be judicial in character. If the general power be judicial, or if the act itself be in aid of some judicial function, it is sufficient. Thus the exercise of judicial power may be essential in the discharge of executive functions. Sawyer v. Dooley, 21 Nev. 390, 32 Pac. 437; People ex rel. Densen v. Simon, 176 Ill. 165, 44 L. R. A. 803, 52 N. E. 910. And courts, in the discharge of their duties, may be required to exercise executive or administrative powers. They may be authorized to make contracts to keep court rooms in repair (White County v. Gwin, 136 Ind. 562, 22 L. R. A. 402, 36 N. E. 237); may appoint commissioners to apportion and assess damages for the opening of a highway (Salem Turnp. & C. Bridge Corp. v. Essex County, 100 Mass. 282; Terre Haute v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. 149 Ind. 174, 37 L. R. A. 189, 46 N. E. 77; Tuolumne County v. Stanislaus County, 6 Cal. 440); may appoint jury commissioners (State v. Kendle, 57 L. R. A.

52 Ohio St. 346, 39 N. E. 947); may determine whether a municipal corporation shall be created, or adjoining territory annexed (Burlington v. Leebrick, 43 Iowa, 253; Wahoo v. Dickinson, 23 Neb. 426, 36 N. W. 813; Winfield v. Linn, 60 Kan. 859, 57 Pac. 549; Ford v. North Des Moines, 80 Iowa, 628, 45 N. W. 1031). But in each and all of these cases the powers are either judicial in character, or are to be exercised in the discharge of functions pertaining to the judicial department. If the matter is one requiring some judicial determination, it may be left to the court or to judges, although it is not involved in the determination of an actual case litigated in the ordinary manner. Thus the propriety and necessity of the construction of a bridge over railway tracks may be left to a judge for decision. State v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 71 Conn. 43, 40 Atl. 925. So may the power to pass on a liquor license. McCrea v. Roberts, 89 Md. 238, 44 L. R. A. 405, 43 Atl. 39. Courts cannot fix railroad, telegraph, telephone, water, and other rates, although they may pass on the reasonableness thereof. Steenerson v. Great Northern R. Co. 69 Minn. 353, 72 N. W. 718; State ex rel. Board of Transportation v. Sioux City, O. & W. R. Co. 46 Neb. 682, 31 L. R. A. 47, 65 N. W. 766; Nebraska Teleph. Co. v. State ex rel. Yeiser, 55 Neb. 627, 45 L. R. A. 113, 76 N. W. 171; State ex rel. Godard v. Johnson, 61 Kan. 803, 49 L. R. A. 662, 60 Pac. 1068. Fixing rates in such instances is purely a legislative act, which cannot be delegated to a constitutional court. With a few dissenting voices, these seem to be the conclusions reached by the courts of the country, and they fully accord with our views. The appointment of trustees to manage and control a system of waterworks belonging to a municipal corporation in advance of litigation or of any dispute concerning their management or control is surely not a judicial function. It is more nearly administrative; but with the affairs of the corporation and the management of its property courts have nothing to do in advance of some dispute. If courts are to select city officials, they may also select those who are to administer the affairs of the county; and it is not going too far to say that they may also be authorized to select state officials. Such a union of power would, as said by Chancellor Kent in Dash v. Van Kleeck, 7 Johns. 477, 5 Am. Dec. 291, "result in tyranny." See also Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168, 26 L. ed. 377; 1 Bl. Com. 269. "That which distinguishes a judicial from a legislative act is that the one is a determination of what the existing law is in relation to some existing thing already done or happened, while the other is a predetermination of what the law shall be for the regulation of future cases falling under its provisions." So wrote Judge Cooley in his invaluable work on Constitutional Limitations (108). Generally speaking, appointment to an office is an executive function. True, not every appointment is executive in character, for appointments may be made by judicial officers in the discharge of their official duties, and the legislature may appoint the officers necessary to enable it to discharge its duties. But such appointments are necessary to enable them to properly discharge their duties, and to maintain their separate existence. These do not involve an encroachment on the function of any other branch. The appointments authorized by the act in question are in no manner connected with the discharge of judicial duties, and to our minds clearly fall within the prohibition of the article of the Constitution hitherto quoted. Much more might be said in support of the conclusion reached, but this opinion has already outgrown proper limits. Judges of courts created by the Constitution should not be burdened with executive or administrative duties. They should, as nearly as possible, be freed from everything not judicial in character. Respect for the position has materially lessened whenever judges have attempted to discharge duties of an executive character. The judge should have no favors to grant, no patronage to dispose of, and no friends to reward. The spoils system should have no place in the selection of judicial officers. The manifest purpose of the legislature in passing the act in question and placing the appointing power in the hands of the judiciary is a compliment that speaks loudly of the integrity, fairness, and independence of judicial officers; but, if they are put on a plane with other officials, who are compelled to, or who, at least, in many instances do, use their appointing power to further their own interests, will they not sacrifice their standing as judges, and defeat the very objects intended to be secured? Let us adhere to the traditions and history of the past; let the judge be supreme in his field, the legislator in his, and the executive remain where the Constitution placed him; let the three co-ordinate departments of government be preserved intact; let neither trench upon the other; and our liberties will be preserved, and our rights duly maintained. Municipal reforms must come from within, and not from without. Good government can only be secured by the active co-operation of good citizens. Those who remain away from the primary and the election and refrain from voting are not only forgetful of their duties, but through neglect they suffer crime to flourish and corruption to reign supreme. They put themselves on a level with the worst elements by consenting to their practice, and in some instances profiting from them, and are morally, if not legally, responsible for existing conditions. The property-owning taxpaying classes, who suffer most, from a material point of view, under mismanagement and corruption, have the remedy in their own hands if they choose to exercise it. This remedy is not by placing all municipal affairs under the control of the judiciary, but by taking the same interest in the administration of local affairs that they manifest in the conduct of their private business. All the authorities seem to agree that legislative and judicial interference in purely municipal matters "has tended very greatly to lessen the sense of responsibility on the part of local officials and upon the part of communities themselves." Goodnow, Mun. Problems, pp. 38, 39. Seth Low's article on "Municipal Home Government" in 1 Bryce, American Commonwealth, chap. 52.

We have given the case the care and attention its importance demands, and, while fully recognizing the rule that an act of the legislature should not be declared unconstitutional unless plainly and clearly within its limitations, are nevertheless constrained to hold that the act cannot be sustained.

The negligent placing of a will so that its existence is not known for several years after testator's death, and the laches of the devisees in not producing it, will not estop him from asserting his claim against one who has acquired a title from the heir at any time before the right to probate or register the will is barred.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Clay County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James D. Black, for appellant:

The judgment of the Clay county court admitting that will to record, and adjudging it to be the last will and testament of T. T. Reid, is conclusive. If his will is valid the

The right to offer a will for probate is limited by the ten years' statute as the period of limitation for an action for relief not otherwise limited.

Allen v. Froman, 96 Ky. 313, 28 S. W. 497.

Mr. D. K. Rawlings for appellee.

White, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In October, 1888, T. T. Reid died in Clay county, never having married or had issue. His only heir at law was J. W. Reid, Sr., his father, the mother having died prior to the death of T. T. Reid. After the death of T. T. Reid, his father, as heir at law, took possession of the real estate left by T. T.

should be admitted to probate although many years have elapsed since the death of the testator. In the absence of a statutory limitation, or any question of the rights of a purchaser for value, or estoppel, it seems that there is no well-defined limitation as to the time of probate. The English rule is stated to be that if a will is probated in common form—that is, in an ex parte proceeding—it may thereafter be probated in solemn form,—that is, on notice to those interested at any time within thirty years. There are a few cases in which it was held that wills may be probated after the lapse of the statutory period, as in cases of concealment, etc. There are cases, also, where the probate was refused without regard to the period of time only,—under circumstances of estoppel and the like.

Reid, containing probably 300 acres. In April, 1890, J. W. Reid, Sr., borrowed of appellee, E. J. Bengé, $600, and to secure its repayment executed a mortgage on the tract of land that had formerly been owned by T. T. Reid, and which J. W. Reid, Sr., then thought he had inherited from his son T. T. Reid. This mortgage was properly executed, delivered, and put to record in the proper office. After the execution and delivery of this mortgage to appellee, the mortgagor, J. W. Reid, Sr., died, and administration was had on his estate by J. W. Reid, Jr. The appellee instituted this action to collect her debt of $600 from the estate of J. W. Reid, Sr., and to enforce her mortgage lien on the tract of land. The administrator and heirs at law of J. W. Reid, Sr., were all made parties. To this action certain of the children of J. W. And it was said that in England a will could be probated in solemn form within thirty years. Straub's Case, 49 N. J. Eq. 264, 24 Atl. 569.

And it was said in Stebbins v. Lathrop, 4 Pick. 33, and Foot v. Foote, 61 Mich. 181, 28 N. W. 90, that the statute directs a will to be probated in thirty days.

And a statute requires a holographic will to be probated in six months. George v. Greer, 53 Miss. 495.

But a codicil over twenty years old was refused probate, in Watson v. Turner, 89 Ala. 225, 8 So. 20 (applying the statutory time for contesting wills).

And a will nineteen years old was held inadmissible to probate on the ground of estoppel in Re Lyman, 14 Misc. 357, 36 N. Y. Supp. 117.

And a second will was denied probate after five years, in Hardy v. Hardy, 26 Ala. 524 (applying a statute).

A will was found among papers in the possession of one of the heirs and offered for probate sixty-three years after the death of the testator. It was held that it should be probated. Haddock v. Boston & M. R. Co. 146 Mass. 155, 15 N. E. 495. In this case the court said: "So long as one can produce the evidence necessary to obtain the probate of a will, we can see no legal reason why one who relies upon it should not be allowed to prove it as he would be permitted to prove a deed, however ancient, under which he claimed title. The fact that he could not offer in evidence a will not admitted to probate, as he might an ancient deed, would certainly afford no reason why its authenticity should not be established in the probate court by its regular course of procedure." In this case the question was only on the probate, and the objector claimed that the title to his real estate might be affected, but the case does not show how.

And in Re Myers, 3 Dem. 193, it was held that a will should be admitted to probate where it was offered more than thirty years after its execution, and proved by one attesting witness, the other being dead. The case does not show when the testatrix died.

In Bourne v. Greenleaf, cited in 1 Pick. 117, note, Mr. Justice Jackson, at the argument, brothers and sisters of T. T. Reid, deceased, filed answer, being already parties hereto, and denied that at the date of the execution of the mortgage by J. W. Reid, Sr., to appellee, or at all, the said J. W. Reid, Sr., had title to the land, or that the same ever descended to him from his son T. T. Reid, their brother. They pleaded that at the regular term of the Clay county court in May, 1895, there was produced and probated the will of T. T. Reid, by which will the land mortgaged was devised to them in conjunction with their father, J. W. Reid, Sr.; that is to say, the father was devised one fourth the land, and the other three fourths to appellants, his brothers and sisters. Appellants therefore denied appellee's right to a lien upon the land, at least to the extent of their interest,—three fourths,—derived under the will of T. T. Reid. By reply the existence and probate of the will was formally denied. The only proof taken was that of appellee, who, if competent for any purpose, established the justness of her claim against J. W. Reid, Sr., which was never an issue, and her entire ignorance of the will of T. T. Reid until it was probated in 1895, more than five years after she had loaned the money to J. W. Reid, Sr., and accepted the mortgage as security. With this proof and the copy of the probated will and orders of the county court the case was submitted for final hearing. The court adjudged to appellee a lien on the whole of the land to satisfy her debt, and decreed a sale thereof, and to reverse that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

It may be said at the outset that there is no pretense or plea that the devisees (appellants) were guilty of any fraud by sup-said there was a case in the county of Essex, perhaps thirty years ago, where it was found that the widow of a testator must hold land under the will, which had not been proved. The will was therefore carried to the probate office, but, more than twenty years having elapsed since the death of the testator, the judge of probate refused to allow it; but upon an appeal the decision was reversed, as a will must be proved and allowed, in order to convey land. The names of the parties in this case are given in Haddock v. Boston & M. R. Co. 146 Mass. 155, 15 N. E. 495, where it was said: "It is a case to which some weight must be attached, as it brought into question directly the authority of the court of probate, and the appeal was to the full bench of the supreme court, which reversed the original decree. While no opinion appears to have been written, it could not but have been a carefully considered case, as it reversed the opinion of the judge of probate as to the extent of his jurisdiction."

And where a will was offered for probate eleven years after the death of the alleged testator and after the death of both of the subscribing witnesses, and on an issue of deviseavit rei non there was evidence of the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses and of the alleged testator, it was held that it was sufficient to admit the will to be read in evidence to the jury. Transue v. Brown, 31 Pa. 92. In this case the court does not discuss the question of limitation or delay, but says that "if rights have vested under the proceedings of the administrator, in selling or distributing the estate, this is not the proper time to protect them."

In Marcy v. Marcy, 6 Met. 360, 370, the question was whether there was sufficient evidence that a will which became operative forty-three years before had been admitted to probate so that it could be read in evidence. The court held that there was such evidence, adding: "On evidence like the present, it would be the duty of the probate court to establish the will, if, for want of form, the probate should have been considered so defective that the will had been rejected as evidence in its present state."

In Shumway v. Holbrook, 1 Pick. 115, 11 Am. Dec. 153, it was said: "If a will can be found, it may be proved in the probate office at any time, in order to establish a title to real estate. It differs from an administration of personal property, which cannot be originally granted upon the estate of any person after twenty years from his decease."

In Clagett v. Hawkins, 11 Md. 381, which was an application to revoke a will, it was 57 L. R. A.

said: "The proposition, that no lapse of time will exclude the inquiry whether certain papers constitute the will of a party, is supported by almost any number of authorities; that of Finucane v. Gayfere, 3 Phillim. Eccl. Rep 405, will suffice for this case."

In Ochoa v. Miller, 59 Tex. 462, it was said that if it is shown that a will has not been under the control of the party offering the same for probate, nor in its proper place of deposit, it may be probated after the lapse of four years if proper steps are taken and proper proof made. It was further said that no "letters testamentary could, however, issue." The statute requires that a will should be probated in four years.

II. Where the estate is sold or mortgaged by the heirs.

Under statutes protecting the rights of purchasers for value as against a subsequent probate of a will, such purchasers are protected if the will is not probated within the statutory time. It is held that a purchaser from a devisee may have the will probated after the statutory time where cause is shown for delay and his title is contested by the heirs; and a purchaser at a judicial sale under an order of the probate court, acquiring title through a will, was held not to be affected by the probate of a subsequent will, of which he had no notice. A party advancing money on a mortgage made by heirs is not protected until after the statutory time for probating the will has elapsed. There are quite a number of cases in which probate was allowed in order to make a link in a chain of title, where the probate did not occur for many years; but in most of these cases the question seems only to have been as to the right to have the will probated, whatever question might occur as to the rights of a purchaser being relegated, without notice, to a subsequent action.

In REID V. BENGEL it was held that in Kentucky a will may be probated at any time within ten years after the death of the testator. In this case the will was probated seven years after the testator's death. The heir had taken possession of the land, and had executed a mortgage thereon, but the devisees were ignorant of the execution of the will. It was held that they were not precluded by lapse of time from asserting their rights.

Where the testatrix died in 1871 it was held that, notwithstanding the expiration of four years from her death, her will might be probated in 1882 to establish a link in a chain of title, although no letters testamentary could is-pressing the will, or in fact knew that such paper existed till long after the execution of appellee's mortgage. It seems to be conceded that all parties acted in good faith upon the facts as they knew them. The question, then, presented for our consideration, is: Is the equity of appellee, acquired under the mortgage executed by J. W. Reid, Sr., when all parties believed he was the legal owner by reason of being heir at law, and five years before the discovery of the will of T. T. Reid, superior to the legal title of the devisees under the will? It is conceded that no statute of limitation applies to bar appellants' right to recover, for it is well settled in this state that a will may be probated at any time within ten years after the death of the testator. Allen v. Froman, 96 Ky. 313, 28 S. W. 497. The will in the case at bar was probated seven years after testator's death. There is no plea of fraud either in suppressing the will or in inducing the appellee to part with her money on the faith of the mortgage security by any of the appellants, at least with any knowledge or information of their rights in the land. As we understand the contention of counsel, his position is that by reason of the negligence of testator in so placing his will as not to be found for seven years after his death, though this may not have been actually intended, and by reason of laches of appellants, devisees thereunder, in not producing the will, the appellee has acquired an equitable claim superior to the legal title under the will. By § 16, chap. 113, Gen. Stat., in force at the death of T. T. Reid, it is provided that the will speaks as of the testator's death, unless a contrary intent appear by the will. Alexander sue, where the will had not been in plaintiff's control, but had all the while been in the place of its appropriate custody, or under the control of the husband of the testatrix. Ryan v. Texas & P. R. Co. 64 Tex. 239. In this case the will was made so as to be available as a deed or will, and it had been recorded as a deed, but litigation arose over it and application for probate was made, but was dismissed under a compromise. The litigation was held sufficient excuse for the laches in plaintiff. Tex. Rev. Stat. art. 1828, provides that no will shall be admitted to probate after the lapse of four years from the death of the testator, unless the party applying for probate was not in default; and in no case shall letters testamentary be issued where the will is probated after four years from the death of the testator. The proponent of the will were purchasers from the devisee and desired to use the will in their chain of title in the contest with the heirs.

In the absence of statutory regulation, it was held that a will might be probated any time after the testator's death. Rebham v. Mueller, 114 Ill. 343, 55 Am. Rep. 869, 2 N. E. 75. In this case the testator died in 1870, and in 1883 the will was admitted to probate. Ill. Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 148, § 12, requires any person who may have in his possession the last will of another, immediately upon the death of the testator, to deliver such will to the county court of the county, and imposes a fine for withholding a will, and punishment for willfully secreting one. It was held that the failure of the custodian to comply with this statute could not affect the rights of any person claiming under the will, or the jurisdiction of the probate court to probate the will within a reasonable time. It was also held that this statute did not fix a definite time within which a will shall be presented to court and admitted to probate, and that there was no statute which may be regarded as a limitation law barring the probate of a will after a specified time. The court said: "If a will is not produced, and letters of administration issue, acts done and rights accrued under such administration will be entitled to protection, so that no serious consequences can follow from the delay in probating a will."

A purchaser from heirs, when sued by the devisees to establish plaintiffs' title and recover their estates, demurred to the complaint on the ground that he was an innocent purchaser, under 2 Ind. Rev. Stat. 1879, p. 574, act May 31, 1852, § 17, providing that the title of any land purchased in good faith for a valuable consideration from heirs shall not be impaired by any devise, unless the will shall have been proved and recorded within three years after the death of the testator, excepting in case of infancy, incompetency, or absence from the state, or concealment of the will. It was held that the question could not be settled by the demurrer where the complaint did not show that the plaintiffs were not within the exceptions. Biggs v. McCarthy, 86 Ind. 352 (44 Am. Rep. 320, omits this).

But purchasers for value and mortgagees were held entitled to successfully resist the probate of a will that was fifteen years old, where all the devisees had attained their majority more than three years prior to the probate of the will. The property was left to the devisees and the heirs of their body, and the will was offered for probate by grandchildren who were born ten years after the testator's death. It was held that purchasers were protected, under Conn. Stat. 209, t. 32, chap. 1, § 30, providing that a will shall not be probated more than ten years after the death of the testator, saving to infants three years after attaining their majority. Goodman v. Russ, 14 Conn. 210.

In Davis v. Gaines, 104 U. S. 386, 26 L. ed. 757, it was held that a sale of lands duly made by order of the probate court having jurisdiction, and the conveyance thereof by the executor of a will, duly admitted to probate while its functions were in full force, to a bona fide purchaser for value, vested the purchaser with a good and valid title which was not affected by the discovery of a later will, and its admission to probate and record. In this case the testator died in August, 1813, and the sale by the register of wills was made November 8, 1813, under a will dated May 20, 1811. The other will was executed July 13, 1813, and an action was brought in 1836 to establish the same as a lost will. It was probated January 18, 1855, and was recognized by the supreme court of Louisiana as the last will on December 17, 1855. La. act March 10, 1834, § 4, provided that all informalities of any public sale made by public officers shall, after five years from the sale, be prescribed against by those claiming under such sales, whether they be minors, married women, or parties interdicted.

Under N. Y. Rev. Stat. 749, § 3, providing that the title of a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration from the heirs shall not be impaired by a devise, unless the will shall have been duly proved or recorded within four years after the death of the testator, except where the will has been concealed by the heirs or some one of them, and except the devisee is a minor, it was held that the title of a bona

v. Waller, 6 Bush, 330. It was held as far back as 1827 in the case of Re Payne's Will, 4 T. R. Mon. 423, that the interest of a devisee vested the instant of testator's death, and was not lost by destruction of the will before probate. This case has never been questioned in this state, so far as we are informed. Applying that rule here, it is clear that at the death of T. T. Reid, in 1888, the appellants, devisees under his will, had a vested estate in his lands, as the will provided. To divest them of this title there must be either conveyance, prescription, or estoppel in some form. It is not pretended that there is a conveyance, or that their right to claim under the will is barred by any statute of limitation. An estoppel is defined by Bouvier to be "the preclusion of a person from asserting a fact by previous conduct inconsistent therewith on his own part or the part of those under whom he claims, or by an adjudication upon his rights which he cannot be allowed to call in question." Stephens defines "estoppel:" "A preclusion in law which prevents a man from alleging or denying a fact in consequence of his own previous act, allegation, or denial of a contrary tenor." Blackstone's definition is: "A special plea in bar, which happens where a man has done some act or executed some deed which precludes him from averring anything to the contrary." It is the foundation of the doctrine of estoppel that the party estopped has designedly so acted or spoken as to induce others to change their position injuriously to themselves; in other words, the doctrine of estoppel is founded on the fraud of the party who is held estopped. But, to be guilty of fraud, a person must knowingly fide purchaser for value, in a proceeding to sell land of an infant heir, was not affected by the probate of a will more than four years from the death of the testator, although one of the heirs took the will from his mother's possession and kept it concealed for fifteen years. In this case the minor heir became of age more than five years prior to the probate, and it was held that the other exception in the statute did not apply. Cole v. Gourlay, 79 N. Y. 527. The testator died in 1836, and the will was probated in 1855.

And purchasers for value from the heirs at law and widow were held not to be affected by the probate of a will where the will was not probated for more than twenty-eight years. It was held that the saving clause in favor of minors did not apply to a child unborn at the time of the death of the testator, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2628 (2 Rev. Stat. 59, § 18), providing that purchasers in good faith for a valuable consideration from the heirs of the owner shall not be affected by the will of the latter unless, four years after his death, the will is established; but if at the time of his death the devisee is within twenty-one years of age the limitation does not begin until after one year from the removal of the disability. The court said: "Certainly the exception is not intended to cover unborn children, especially before gestation." Fox v. Fee, 167 N. Y. 44, 60 N. E. 281.

In Gilkinson v. Miller, 74 Fed. 181, which was an action of ejectment, it was held that the purchaser was not a bona fide purchaser, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2628, providing as above. In this case the testatrix died in 1876 leaving the property to plaintiff, an infant, and the will was offered for probate and a contest made by the heir at law, and probate was refused in 1878. The heir at law took possession and sold the same, in 1874, to the defendant, and paid to the infant devisee, on her becoming of age, $1,000 for a release of all claims, which release was executed without knowledge that the decree of the surrogate court would affect her title. The purchaser had the title examined, and had notice of the probate proceedings. The court said: "The section of the Code in question cannot be construed to protect one who had actual notice of a will conveying the property away from the heir at law." The infant became of age in 1882, and the action to recover the land was brought thirteen years thereafter. The provision of the Code gives the devisee one year after becoming of age to probate the will, but this provision is not construed in the decision. 57 L. R. A.

In this case probate had been refused on the ground that the testatrix was incompetent.

East Riding registry act, 6 Anne, chap. 35, provides that a memorial of deeds, conveyances, and wills may be registered, and every deed or conveyance shall be fraudulent and void against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee for a valuable consideration unless such memorial is registered; and that memorials of wills shall be registered within the space of six months after the death of the deviser or testatrix dying within Great Britain or within three years if the death occur beyond the seas. It was held that the title of a mortgagee for value was not affected by a will which was not discovered by the devisee until the expiration of six months after the death of the testator. Chadwick v. Turner, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 810, 85 L. J. Ch. N. S. 849, 12 Jur. N. S. 239, 14 L. T. N. S. 86, 14 Week. Rep. 491.

III. Where the devisees are under disabilities.

In some cases the disability of a devisee, as minority, and the like, is held to excuse delay in offering a will for probate. Where a statute provides a saving clause for minors they must bring themselves strictly within its provisions. A statutory exemption in favor of minors is held not to apply to infants not begotten at the time of the testator's death.

The probate of a will was suspended at the instance of the heir at law, and remained for many years unnoticed during the infancy of the legatees, but was afterwards proved. It was held that the legatees, notwithstanding some delay after majority, would be entitled to assert their rights, of which they were ignorant until the final probate of the will, against volunteers. Taliaferro v. Taliaferro, 4 Call (Va.) 93.

And where some of the heirs were under disabilities it was held that a second probate was properly ordered, on notice to all parties interested, nine years after a will had been probated. Gray v. Maer, 20 N. C. (3 Dev. & B. L.) 47.

In Gaines v. New Orleans, 6 Wall. 842, 15 L. ed. 950, where an infant attaining majority in 1826 brought suit in 1834 to establish a second lost will, the first having been probated in 1813, it was held that her rights were not affected by twenty years' prescription, although the second will was not admitted to probate until 1855.

In Utheridge v. Corprew, 48 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 14, where a will had been probated in common form, and the heirs were under disabilities of coverture, absence beyond the seas, non-do or say that which is inconsistent with honesty and truth, or, regardless of what the truth may be, induce a person to act. There can be no case found where any person was ever charged with fraud or held to be estopped where he was ignorant of the truth and did no act at all. In the case at bar the devisees under the will of T. T. Reid did nothing, said nothing, and at that time were in entire ignorance of the existence of a will, or that they had any rights in the property. In fact, if there was no will, which they then believed to be the truth, they knew that they had no right, title, or interest in the land. They knew that without a will the land descended to their father, J. W. Reid, Sr. There can be no act of appellants that could by any rule of law be held to estop them from claiming under the will of T. T. Reid. It may be said that a person may speak a falsehood or act a falsehood, but, if he does no act, and remains silent, he cannot be charged with fraud or be estopped without he knew the truth when his nonaction or being silent is said to have induced another to act to his own injury. Likewise there can be no estoppel of appellants by reason of the act of the testator in not disclosing to some person the place where his will could be found. He was not called upon to publish the fact that he had made a will for the protection of appellee, for it was some two years after T. T. Reid's death that appellee had any claim of lien upon the land. Surely, a dead person cannot be charged with negligence, or be estopped, or create matters of estoppel by a failure to act after his death; yet this would be the effect of holding that appellants are chargeable with the fact that the will was not found before appellee's mortgage was executed by reason of some act or omission of T. T. Reid. There seems to be a dearth of authority on the exact quesresidence, and lunacy, it was held that the lapse of ten years, in the absence of notice of the testator's death, would not bar an application by them for probate in solemn form. This in effect would be granting an opportunity to contest the will, as they claimed that the testator was incapacitated to make a valid will.

But an infant was held barred from asserting his rights under a will against a bona fide purchaser, where such infant had attained his majority more than five years prior to the probate, and N. Y. Rev. Stat. 749, § 3, protected a bona fide purchaser if the will was not proved in five years, except as against a minor. Cole v. Gourlay, 79 N. Y. 527.

And a clause saving the rights of minors, in N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2628 (2 Rev. Stat. 59, § 18), providing four years for probating a will and protecting the rights of bona fide purchasers, was held not to include heirs not born at the time of the testator's death. Fox v. Fee, 167 N. Y. 44, 60 N. E. 281.

See Gilkinson v. Miller, 74 Fed. 131, subd. 11, for the same statute, where the devisee was not barred from her rights thirteen years after reaching majority.

The testatrix died in 1826. Her will gave the real estate to her four children to be equally divided between them and "to the heirs of their bodies forever." The devisees, being without issue, agreed on a division of the property, and not to probate the will. In 1836 a devisee had issue of his body born, and died in 1839. The will was offered for probate by the guardian of the children of this devisee in 1841, which was more than thirteen years after the death of the testator, and more than three years after all the devisees had attained their majority. It was held that the will could not be probated, under Conn. Stat. 209, t. 32, chap. 1, § 39, providing that no will shall be allowed to be probated by any court of probate after the expiration of ten years from the death of the testator, provided that where any minor is interested in the estate three years shall be allowed after his arrival at full age to prove the will. Goodman v. Russ, 14 Conn. 210.

IV. Where the will is concealed, lost, or destroyed.

Knowledge, by some of the devisees, of the existence of a will, where the will has been concealed, will not stop the running of a statute providing that the time a will has been concealed by the heirs is not to be taken into consideration. The concealment must be one that leaves the devisees ignorant of their rights, and keeps the will from their knowledge. There must be some affirmative action in order to constitute concealment with the purpose to prevent its discovery. In actions for equitable relief to establish lost wills, twenty and thirty years have been held to be a bar, and, on the other hand, twenty years were held not to apply where a will was fraudulently concealed, and a ten-years statute barring a bill for relief was held not to bar an action to establish a lost will twenty years old.

A testator died in 1867, and the will, which had been found among worthless papers after the death of plaintiff's father, was probated in 1896. In 1869 it had been used in an action contesting a second will, and its existence was known to the testator's widow, the plaintiff's father, and all the other heirs. It was held that the title of a purchaser for a valuable consideration from the heirs and widow was not affected by its probate twenty-nine years after the testator's death, and that the concealment clause did not apply, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2628 (2 Rev. Stat. 59, § 18), providing that purchasers in good faith for a valuable consideration from the heirs of the owner shall not be affected by a will of the latter unless within four years after his death the will is probated; but if the will is concealed by one or some of the heirs of the testator the limitation does not begin until one year from the delivery of the will to the devisee, representative, or surrogate. Fox v. Fee, 167 N. Y. 44, 60 N. E. 281.

In Cole v. Gourlay, 79 N. Y. 527, under a similar statute (N. Y. Rev. Stat. 749, § 3), it was held that the concealment clause in the statute did not affect the title of a bona fide purchaser where one of the heirs took the will and kept it concealed for fifteen years, and the claimant heir became of age more than five years prior to the probate. In this case the court said: "Certainly the statute cannot relate to a case where the devisees, or some of them, have knowledge or possession of the will, and it is taken from the possession of one by another clandestinely and secreted for a great length of time, or perhaps destroyed. The will was delivered to the widow, who was executrix and one of the devisees having a life estate, and remained in her possession for a number of years. It is fairly to be inferred that she had knowledge of the character of the instrument, and there can be no question that the tion here presented. After diligent search learned counsel for appellee finds only one case that approaches the question, and after diligent search by us we have failed to add another. The case found is Chadwick v. Turner, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 310. There the court held, under a registration act, that after six months, there being no registration of a will, the devisee would take subject to a mortgage executed by the heir at law. The case cited, coming from such eminent authority, would have great weight with us if it did not depend entirely on an act requiring registration of wills. But that case is not authority in this state for the reason that here we have no law requiring wills to be registered or recorded within any given time. This court has held that a will may be probated at any time till the cause of action to probate is barred by the ten-year statute of limitation. There is no statute requiring wills to be registered or recorded or probated, like there is of conveyances; and in the absence of such statute, and in the absence of fraud in suppression or destruction of wills, the devisees therein take the property when the will is probated, which, as we have said, may be at any time within ten years from the testator's death.

We conclude, therefore, that appellants have not been divested in any way of their legal title to the three fourths of the land devised by T. T. Reid, and, not having been divested, it is superior to appellee's mortgage; wherefore, for the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for judgment, with decree of sale in favor of appellee, Benge, as against one fourth the land embraced in the mortgage only, and for proceedings consistent herewith.

son who purloined and concealed it about his person for fifteen years had such knowledge. The case was not one of concealment, within the statute, but of a will which was stolen from the person who was the proper custodian."

In Goodman v. Russ, 14 Conn. 210, it was held to be no fraud on infant grandchildren to suppress the probate of a will, where fifteen years elapsed after the death of the testatrix before the will was offered for and denied probate. The will gave the property to the children of the testatrix and to the heirs of their bodies, and the devisees had attained their majority more than three years prior to the probate. Conn. Stat. 209, t. 32, chap. 1, § 89, provided that no will shall be allowed to be probated by any court of probate after the expiration of ten years from the death of the testator, and gave to infants three years after majority to probate the same. It was held that grandchildren born after a division and sale had no rights, as they took by descent, and not by purchase, and they could not claim a probate as against purchasers for value. In this case the court said: "If the only persons interested in the establishment of this will were the surviving devisees on the one hand, and the heirs in tail on the other, this would certainly merit great consideration. But the appellants are bona fide creditors or purchasers, and are not charged with any knowledge whatever of the existence or concealment of the will."

In Hunt v. Hamilton, 9 Dana, 90, in a proceeding in equity after the lapse of thirty years to establish a will claimed to have been lost, it was said: "Even if the bill presented a case of which a court of equity could, without any doubt, take cognizance, still the long lapse of time, without any suggestion of inability to establish the will in the county court, or to proceed in equity sooner, would prima facie furnish a sufficient objection to the relief now sought by affording presumptions of law against the validity of the alleged will, or against any equitable right to invoke the chancellor's aid in investigating its authenticity, or in coercing a distribution of property so changeable and perishable as slaves and personalty, at so late a period."

In Myers v. O'Hanlon, 12 Rich. Eq. 196, the testator died in 1835, and six days thereafter his will was probated in common form. A bill was filed in 1857 to establish a later will executed a few days before the testator's death, and alleged to have been fraudulently destroyed by a son-in-law of the testator. The plaintiff claimed as devisee under the lost will, and alleged want of notice until within four years before the filing of the bill. It was held that, as the court of ordinary had exclusive jurisdiction, the bill in equity to establish the lost will should be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, and was said that, if it had jurisdiction, the lapse of twenty years barred relief in equity, and was intimated that the evidence showed that the complainant had knowledge of the existence of the will more than four years prior to the institution of the suit. The statute of limitations is not stated, but is referred to, and evidently is the same as S. C. Gen. Stat. § 1870, subd. 2 (Acts 1839, chap. XI. p. 59, § 11), which provides that probate in common form shall be good unless some person interested shall give notice to the judge of probate within four years after probate that he requires it to be proved in due form of law, whereupon, after a due hearing, a judge of probate by his decree shall pronounce for the validity of the will.

But where the existence of a will was claimed to have been unknown for thirty-one years after the testator's death, it was held that Me. Rev. Stat. chap. 64, § 1, providing that after twenty years from the death of any person no probate of his will shall be originally granted, did not apply if the will had been fraudulently concealed. This was on the ground stated by the court, "that fraudulent concealment of a cause of action has long been considered a good replication to a statute bar in actions at law, as well as in suits in equity." It was further held that a statute taking effect after the case was set down for argument did not apply. This statute (chap. 108, Stat. 1887) provided that when an original last will is produced for probate, the time during which it has been lost, suppressed, concealed, or carried out of the state, shall not be taken as part of the limitation provided in the 1st section. The case was remanded to the probate court to try the question of fraudulent concealment. In this case the property claimed still remained in the family. Denke's Appeal, 80 Me. 50, 12 Atl. 790.

And where an action was brought to establish a lost will more than twenty years after the death of the testator, it was held that the action was not barred by 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 2d ed. 229, § 52, providing that bills for relief, in case of the existence of a trust, not cognizable by the courts of common law, and in all other cases not herein provided for, shall be filed within ten years after the cause thereof shall accrue, and not after. This section was held to apply to bills filed for relief exclusively, and the bill in this case was held not to be within the spirit or letter of the statute. Everitt v. Rveritt, 41 Barb. 385, Affirmed Commission Appeals, 6 Alb. L. J. 197.

But see Allen v. Froman, 96 Ky. 313, 28 S. W. 497, subd. X.

Where a will was probated in 1813, and a suit to establish a lost second will was brought in 1834, and it was established in 1855, it was held that the title of the devisee was not barred by prescription. Gaines v. New Orleans, 6 Wall. 642, 18 L. ed. 950; Gaines v. Hennen, 24 How. 553, 16 L. ed. 770. In these cases the legatee attained majority in 1826, and brought the action in 1834. The ten-years statute of prescription was held not to bar the action, as the propounder of the will brought her suit within ten years after reaching majority, although the will was not finally established until forty-three years after the death of the testator.

In Camden Safe Deposit & T. Co. v. Ingham, 40 N. J. Eq. 3, where the will of a wife was not probated until ten years after her death, and after her husband's death, and the husband by a certificate on the will had consented to its execution, it was held that the will was a valid one, and that the failure of the husband to probate the will was a fraud on the wife and those entitled to the benefit of it, and that the husband and his individual estate was bound by the will. It was further held that the husband of the testatrix, concealing the will, was liable to account for trust money received by him that would have passed under her will.

And where a testator died in 1825, and the will was probated in the county court thirty-four years after his death, a suit was brought in the chancery court for an account, if the will was valid after the lapse of so many years, and if not, to establish the same as a lost or spoiled will, and charging that the will had been fraudulently concealed by the widow of the testator and her second husband up to the time of its probate. The defense was want of jurisdiction in a court of equity, and want of jurisdiction in the county court to probate the will after thirty-four years. It was held that the validity of the probate in the county court could not be attacked collaterally. The court said: "The fact that more than thirty years had elapsed since the death of the testator and before the paper was offered for probate can make no difference." Townsend v. Townsend, 4 Coldw. 70, 94 Am. Dec. 185. In this case it was said that whether or not Tenn. Code, § 2220, providing that all letters testamentary granted after the period of twenty years shall be void, could be successfully relied on as a bar to the issuance of letters testamentary, on an application in the county court to set aside the probate, or upon an issue of deviseavit vel non made and certified to the circuit court, "we do not feel called upon now to determine." It was further held that the court could not establish the will as a lost will where it had already been probated in the county court.

V. Estoppel.

A party by his conduct may estop himself from subsequently procuring probate of a will. Where a party is estopped his privies are also. But to constitute an estoppel it must be shown that there was no obstacle to the assertion of the right to have the will probated.

A second wife of a husband was held bound by the estoppel of her husband, and could not probate a second will nineteen years after the first, where he had probated the first will and recognized the rights thereunder. Re Lyman, 14 Misc. 352, 30 N. Y. Supp. 117. 57 L. R. A.

A testatrix died in 1867, the estate being a purchase-money note given by Ellisha Foote. The heirs, at a family meeting, in consideration of a claim for services rendered the testatrix, asserted by the maker, surrendered the note to him. He then cut his name off and took possession of the note. In 1883 the will was produced and probated by the maker of the note. He was appointed administrator with the will annexed, and asserted a claim for services against the estate. It was held that the failure for fourteen years to probate the will should bar the claim. The court, holding that it was not necessary to fully decide that question, said: "But it is very certain that justice to all parties interested in the provisions of a will requires that, under the statutes in this state as they now exist, a party holding the will, or one having knowledge of its existence, and under which he claims an interest in the legacies, must secure its probate within a reasonable time after he knows of the death of the testator; or, failing so to do, he may bar himself from making claim under its provisions to the benefits thereof; and we think a lapse of fourteen years after a knowledge of the death of the testator, under such circumstances (and as they appear in this record), an unreasonable time, and that such defense to the claim of the plaintiff sought to be enforced against the estate of Ellisha was a proper one to be made." Foote v. Foote, 61 Mich. 181, 28 N. W. 90.

And where a will of a wife gave the husband of the testatrix a life estate and remainder to his daughter, and six days thereafter another will was executed giving the husband an absolute estate in fee, and the husband probated the first will and recognized the daughter's title, it was held that his subsequent wife could not have the later will probated nineteen years afterwards, as he would have been estopped, and she was also. Re Lyman, 14 Misc. 352, 30 N. Y. Supp. 117. In this case the court said: "In the case at bar the will now propounded was never lost or mislaid, and was not discovered, because it was in the possession of Mr. Lyman, the sole beneficiary, or under his control, from the time of its execution until the day of his death, a period of almost nineteen years. If, therefore, Mr. Lyman would have been estopped, the present proponent, claiming no more rights than he had, is now subjected to the same principle of equity."

And a party who had acted upon a decree of probate in common form, and received interest under such will for several years, was held to be precluded from obtaining a probate in solemn form nine years after the former probate. Hoffman v. Norris, Prerog. Hil. Term 1805, 2 Phillim. Eccl. Rep. 224, n.

A will was offered for probate in 1833, and was recorded and filed, but no order was made probating the same. Twenty-three years afterwards it was offered and proved for probate, and it was held that the probate was properly allowed. Fatheree v. Lawrence, 33 Miss. 585. In this case the court said: "We do not think that the delay in the proceeding now before us raises any presumption against the validity of the will, or tends to destroy the presumptions in its favor arising from the evidence." The court further said: "The long continued possession of the appellants, adversely to the will, is said to raise a presumption against its validity. . . . But be that as it may (as there is no limit to the time for the probate of a will), before the fact of adverse possession could be held to create a presumption against the validity of the will, by reason of his acquiescence in the adverse title and so as to preclude him of the right to probate the will, it should be shown that there was no impediment."

ment to the assertion of his rights, and that his acquiescence was tantamount to a disclaimer under the will, with a full knowledge of its legal character."

VI. Second wills and codicils.

In regard to the question of the effect of delay in probating a will, the rule that applies to the probate of an original will applies to a second will or a codicil offered for probate. But there may be circumstances that make a difference,—as, where a purchaser under a probate proceeding on a former will is protected against any rights that may arise under the probate of a second will or codicil. This was held in one of the Gaines cases, in which a purchaser under the first will of Daniel Clark, of 1811, was held to have a good title as against the devisees under the will of 1813, which was not finally admitted to probate until 1855. There may be circumstances, also, of estoppel which would justify a refusal of probate, but ordinarily the probate is allowed, in the absence of statute, after many years have elapsed, and the question of estoppel or the rights of a purchaser are matters that are subsequent to probate. It is held in Alabama that, as a codicil is ordinarily a revocation of a will, the time within which the codicil should be presented for probate will be limited to the statutory time allowed for contesting the probate of a will.

In a controversy between a purchaser under a former will and a sale by order of the probate court and the heirs under a later will, it was held that a bona fide purchaser was not affected by the probate of a later will, and that the title of the purchaser, as against no advertisement or irregularities in regard to inventory, was cured by La. act March 10, 1834, § 4, providing that all informalities of any public sale made by public officers shall, after five years from the sale, be prescribed against by those claiming under such sales, whether they be minors, married women, or parties interdicted. Davis v. Gaines, 104 U. S. 386, 26 L. ed. 757.

In Gaines v. New Orleans, 6 Wall. 642, 18 L. ed. 950, where the same will was in controversy, it was held that the probate of the later will annulled the prior will, and that the power of executors, under the Code of 1813, terminated the year after they were appointed, and that the purchasers from the executors of the prior will had no title as against the heir under the second will; and, as to the statute of limitations, the rule laid down in Gaines v. Hennen, 24 How. 553, 16 L. ed. 770, was followed. In that case the defense was that the heir was barred by prescription of ten years against one claiming a vacant estate, twenty years to prescribe a title, and thirty years to bar the faculty of accepting a succession. It was held that there was no vacant succession, and the first ten years did not apply, and the prescription of twenty years did not exist, as Mrs. Gaines attained her majority only in June, 1826, and her suit for the probate of the will was instituted in 1834, and when her petition was dismissed in 1838 her first appeal was filed in the month afterwards. From that time there was a legal interruption to the prescription for twenty years.

In Gaines v. Fuentes, 92 U. S. 10, 23 L. ed. 524, it was held that the Federal court had jurisdiction of an action in equity to annul the probate of a second will.

And where a will was executed in 1818 and probated in 1830, and subsequently, without setting such probate aside, in 1845, a will dated 1828 was offered for probate, it was said that the county court had jurisdiction to admit to probate the second will without setting aside 57 L. R. A.

the probate of the first. Schultz v. Schultz, 10 Gratt. 358, 60 Am. Dec. 835. The court does not discuss the question of laches or limitation, but the decision was on the ground of the conclusiveness of the action of the county court in refusing probate of the second will. The court said that, under 1 Va. Rev. Code, chap. 104, p. 578, act 1819, providing that when a will shall have been admitted to probate any person interested may within ten years contest its validity, such probate is forever binding, with a saving in favor of persons absent from the state. In this case it was held that complainants were within the saving in favor of persons absent from the state. The probate of the second will would be in effect a contest as to the validity of the first will.

In Waters v. Stickney, 12 Allen, 1, 90 Am. Dec. 122, a will was probated in 1851, and a codicil escaping attention was offered for probate in 1865. The codicil was written on the same sheet of paper on which the will was executed. It was held that it could be probated. The court said: "It has been directly adjudged by this court that a will may be proved even thirty years after the death of the testator, although original administration could not by statute be granted after twenty years. Bourne v. Greenleaf, Essex, 1802; Cited in 1 Pick. 117, note; 3 Dane, Abr. 452 (456); Shumway v. Holbrook, 1 Pick. 117, 11 Am. Dec. 153; Marcy v. Marcy, 6 Met. 370. . . .

The lapse of time since the death of the testator and the probate of the will should lead the court closely to scrutinize the evidence offered, but is no positive bar. If no will had yet been proved, the lapse of time would not prevent both will and codicil from being proved now. The fact that a will has been already proved affords no reason for imposing stricter limitations upon the proof of a codicil, whether the omission to prove it sooner has been occasioned by ignorance of its existence, by fraudulent suppression of it, or by an innocent but mistaken belief that it has been already proved."

In Besancon v. Brownson, 39 Mich. 388, a will made in 1858 in Louisiana was probated in Michigan in 1876. The testator died in 1871. This probate was held to be regular. In May, 1871, a writing purporting to be a later will was probated in Louisiana, five years before the probate of the first will in Michigan. In 1877, probate of the second will was made in Michigan, and the probate of the first will was set aside. On appeal this was held to be error, as the probate of the first will should have been allowed to stand and the second probated if it was proper to do so, and that if they conflicted it should be settled elsewhere. But it was further held that the probate of the second will was improper because obtained by a party not shown to be interested, under Mich. C. L. § 4343, authorizing the probate of a foreign probate by the executor or other person interested in such will. In this case the court said: "There is no statutory provision concerning the revocation of probate, or its effect on existing rights. Neither is there any statute providing for cases where a will claimed to be later in date than the one before probated is presented for probate, nor declaring the effect of probate of one will on a later one which was known to exist before the time of the first probate, but not then produced. The difficulties attending a case like the present, where the Louisiana probate of the second will was not made known when the Michigan probate of several years later was had of the first will, are very serious, and still further complicated by the transfer to the purchaser of the property given by the first will."

Supp. 117, it was held that a second will of a wife giving the husband an estate in fee could not be probated by a subsequent wife nineteen years after the probate of a will of his former wife which gave him a life estate, where he had acted on the first will.

In Hardy v. Hardy, 26 Ala. 524, the probate was denied of a second will, offered for probate five years after a previous will made by the same testator was probated. It was held that Ala. act 1808 (Clay's Dig. 598, § 15), providing that when any will has been admitted to probate it may be contested by any person interested within five years thereafter, applied, as the probate of a second will amounted to a revocation of the first.

So, where a will was admitted to probate it was held that a codicil containing inconsistent provisions would not be allowed after the expiration of the statutory period of five years for contesting the will. Watson v. Turner, 89 Ala. 225, 8 So. 20. In this case the codicil was presented for probate more than twenty years after the probate of the will. The delay seems to have been caused by a provision in the codicil to the effect that the testator wanted his will recorded at his death, and that the codicil should not be recorded until after the death of his wife. This provision was held to be insufficient excuse for any delay in probating the codicil.

For second wills, see Myers v. O'Hanlon, 12 Rich. Eq. 196, subd. IV.

VII. Suspension of probate proceedings.

It seems that the suspension of the probate of a will for several years after an attempt to probate the same will not deprive the legatees of their rights under the will.

Legatees who had been minors were held entitled to their rights, of which they were ignorant until the final probate, as against volunteers, where a probate was suspended for many years. Taliaferro v. Taliaferro, 4 Call (Va.) 93.

And under Tex. Rev. Stat. arts. 1827, 1828, providing that no will shall be probated after the lapse of four years from the death of the testator, unless it be shown by proof that the party applying for such probate was not in default in failing to present the same for probate within four years, it was held that a probate made four years and nine months after the death of the testator was valid. Elwell v. Universalist General Convention, 76 Tex. 514, 13 S. W. 552. In this case a party filed the will for probate in the county court within four months, and a motion to dismiss was made because he was not interested. He then filed an amendment setting up that the application was by him as trustee for the Universalists, whose name had been changed to Universalists General Convention. The will was probated in the county court, and an appeal was taken to the district court, and the Universalists General Convention made application as a party in that case, which was four years and nine months after the death of the testatrix. The court held that the Universalists General Convention was not in default in presenting the will for probate. The question in this case was as to whether the probate should be allowed.

A testator of a will deposited it, with the knowledge of a devisee, in the office of the probate judge of the county in which he lived, and immediately upon his death the executor inquired of the probate judge concerning the probate of the will. The judge, after opening and reading it, informed him that the will was the joint will of the husband and wife and 57 L. R. A.

could not be probated until the death of the wife. Six years thereafter the executor again asked the probate judge about the probating of the will, and received the same answer. The will was not admitted to probate until nine years after the death of the testator, during all which time it was in the possession of the probate judge. It was held that the estate devised was not within the provision of Kan. Comp. Laws 1879, chap. 117, § 29, providing that no will shall be effectual to pass real estate until probated or recorded by this act, and § 30, providing that no lands shall pass to any devisee in a will who shall know of the existence thereof and have the same in his power and control for three years, unless within that time he shall cause the same to be offered for probate; and by such neglect the estate devised shall descend to the heirs. Allen v. Allen, 28 Kan. 18. This was a contest, by an action of ejectment, between the devisee and an heir of the testator.

And a will was held to be properly allowed probate where it had been filed for probate and recorded, but no order had been made probating the same for twenty-three years. Fatherree v. Lawrence, 33 Miss. 585. In this case there was no question as to the genuineness of the instrument, but the objections were to the sufficiency of its execution, and lapse of time.

VIII. Probate in solemn form and second probate.

In England it seems the practice is for the executor to obtain probate of a will in an ex parte proceeding, and subsequently, on notice to all parties, the will may be probated in solemn form. The time within which this may be done is usually stated to be thirty years although some writers differ as to the time. The time may be limited to a much shorter period where the element of estoppel appears.

The lapse of ten years was held not to bar an application for probate in solemn form by heirs who were under disabilities. Etheridge v. Corprew, 48 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 14.

In 4 Burn's Eccl. Law, 251, it was said: "Which difference of form in proving the will worketh this diversity of effect; namely, that the executor of the will proved in the absence of them which have interest, may be compelled to prove the same again in due form of law; and if the witnesses be dead in the mean time, it may endanger the whole testament, especially if ten years be not past since the probation, whereby necessary solemnities are presumed to have been observed; whereas, the testament being proved in form of law, the executor is not to be compelled to prove the same any more; and although all the witnesses afterwards be dead, the testament doth still retain its full force. Swinburne, Wills, 449. But probably this word 'ten' in figures may have been mistaken for thirty; for Dr. Godolphin says: 'The will being proved only in common form, it may be questioned at any time within thirty years next after, by common opinion, before it work prescription. God. O. L. 62.'

In Straub's Case, 49 N. J. Eq. 264, 24 Atl. 569, it was said that in the English ecclesiastical court "when a will is proved in common form the court, at any time within thirty years after probate, may require the executor of its own motion, or at the instance of the next of kin or other person interested, to prove the will in solemn form."

In Townsend v. Bonner, 1 Shannon, Cas. 197, it was held that where the will was probated in common form thirty-three years after the testator's death the probate could be set aside upon petition in the county court, holding that the time for probating wills was limited to thirty years by the analogy of the common law applicable to this country. It was also held that wills made before the enactment of statutes prescribing the time within which wills may be probated were subject to the rule which existed independent of the statutes, that the executor of a will proved in common form may at any time within thirty years be compelled by a person having interest to prove it per testes in solemn form, and therefore the probate in common form could be set aside within the time limited for the probate of wills.

In Gibson v. Lane, 9 Yerg. 475, it was held that a probate in solemn form could be had after the lapse of eighteen years from the probate in common form. The court said: "The argument that the statute of limitations would protect those who might have acquired rights under the will proven in the ordinary form, and that, therefore, there could be no use in having an issue of deviseavit vel non, does not alter the rule of law. Upon the trial of this issue, the right of the property cannot be called in question; and if the persons who may be in possession are protected by the statute of limitations, the trial of the issue can do them no injury; but if they are not so protected, it is absolutely necessary that the contest relative to the will should be settled, for otherwise no suit could be brought against them. Then, inasmuch as the court could not know whether the statute of limitations would bar the proceedings for the recovery of the property, if the will be not set aside, and could not try this question upon proceedings instituted to test the validity of the will, we think the court erred in quashing the proceedings."

In Merryweather v. Turner, 3 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 802, it was held that next of kin were not barred by mere lapse of time, by acquiescence, or by the receipt of legacies, from requiring executors to prove a will in solemn form. But where a will had been declared well proved in a court of chancery after an order for an issue deviseavit vel non had been discharged on the petition of the heiress at law (also sole next of kin) and her husband, and an annuity bequeathed to her regularly received during fourteen years, it was held that the prayer of the heiress at law and her husband to call on the executors to prove that will in solemn form could not be granted.

In Gray v. Maer, 20 N. C. (3 Dev. & B. L.) 47, where a will was proved the day after it was executed, and it gave the entire estate and remainder to a party present at its execution who was not next of kin, and the next of kin resided at a distance, and some were under disabilities, it was held that a second probate was properly ordered nine years thereafter on notice to the parties interested. The effect of this would be simply to allow a contest over the probate of a will.

In Townsend v. Townsend, 4 Coldw. 70, 94 Am. Dec. 185, it was said that on proper application made out a will probated in the county court may "be set aside at any time within twenty years after the original probate is granted, and the will propounded for reprobate, and an issue of deviseavit vel non made up and tried in the circuit court."

In Hoffman v. Norris, Prerog. Hilary Term, 1805, 2 Phillim. Eccl. Rep. 224, note, where a brother sought to have his brother's executor probate a will in solemn form, it was held that, as he had acted upon the decree of common form and received interest for five years, and he did not offer to return what he had received, he could not obtain a probate in solemn form nine years after the former probate. In this case the court laid down the rule: "Where the opposing party has been in a situation which rendered it impossible or difficult for him to have proceeded earlier, if he has been absent from the country, a minor, or laboring under imbecility, he may be admitted. But without reason, and where there are such strong reasons as there are here to show that he was not in such a state of incapacity as to have prevented him; and further, that he could not be ignorant of all the circumstances relating to the deceased, from the suit in chancery soon after the probate was taken out,—the case is different."

S. C. Gen. Stat. § 1870, subd. 2 (Acts 1839, chap. XI. p. 59, § 11), providing that probate in common form shall be good unless some person interested shall give notice to the judge of probate within four years after probate that he requires it to be proved in due form of law, whereupon, after a due hearing, a judge of probate by his decree shall pronounce for the validity of the will, was said to be a bar to the probate of a second will twenty-two years after probate in common form, although it was alleged that the second will had been destroyed, and that the fraud had not been discovered within four years prior to this suit. Myers v. O'Hanlon, 12 Rich. Eq. 196.

IX. Wills from other states.

It seems that the question of delay in probating wills from other states or taking out ancillary letters does not appear to be considered, except in Ohio, where a statute was construed, and in Alabama. In the latter state it was held that a delay of one year to probate a will barred the executrix from obtaining letters testamentary, which were ordered to be issued to the administrator with the will annexed. Although the question of delay was not discussed in the cases generally, they are grouped to show the various periods of delay that existed in the cases. Otherwise they are not of much benefit as an authority as to the effect of delay.

The provision of 47 Ohio Laws, 32, act March 20, 1849, § 4, that the title of any purchaser of lands derived from heirs of a non-resident shall not be defeated by the production of the will of such nonresident, unless such will shall be admitted to probate and record in the county where the land is situated within two years from the death of the testator, was held not to apply where the will had been admitted to record in the state prior to the passage of the act. Carpenter v. Denoon, 29 Ohio St. 379. In this case the will had been probated in Virginia in 1828, and a copy probated and recorded in Clinton county, Ohio, in 1846, and recorded in Pickaway county, Ohio, in 1869, where the land in controversy was situated.

In the above case, it was said that a devise lapses by neglect to cause a known will to be offered for or admitted to probate, under Ohio act 1840, § 34 (act 1852, § 32), providing that "no lands, tenements, or hereditaments shall pass to any devisee in a will, who shall know of the existence thereof, and shall have the same in his power to control, for the term of three years, unless within that time he shall cause the same to be offered for or admitted to probate; and by such neglect the estate devised to such devisee shall descend to the heirs of the testator." But it was held that this act did not apply to neglect in causing a copy of a probated will to be recorded in the county where the devised property was situated where the will was probated in a court having jurisdiction; and it was held not to apply where it was not shown that the legatees had knowledge of the existence of the will three years before the record was made in a county in Ohio where the realty was situated.

And under Ohio wills act 1840, § 28, providing that copies of wills, executed and proved according to the laws of any state relative to any property in this state, may be admitted to record in the court of common pleas of any county in this state where any such property may be situated, and such copies, so recorded, shall have the same validity as wills made in this state in conformity with the laws thereof, —it was held that where a will giving a life estate and remainder was admitted to record in Cuyahoga county, Ohio, in 1846, on a probate in Virginia in 1828, the rights of the remaindermen in property in Pickaway county, Ohio, were not affected by a conveyance from the life tenants in 1840. Ibid. In this case the court said: "It is true that provision is made for recording a copy of the will and the order of probate in other counties where lands devised by the will are situate; but the recording in such other counties is not made a condition upon which the estate of the devisee vests, nor does the failure to record such copy and order of probate in any case defeat the title of the devisee. The only cause for which the statute defeats the estate of a devisee under a domestic will is his own neglect to offer it for probate within three years after knowledge of its existence as prescribed in § 34, as above stated."

In Keith v. Proctor, 114 Ala. 676, 21 So. 502, a will had been probated in Tennessee, and a year thereafter the executrix probated it in Alabama, and applied for letters testamentary. It was held that delay and failure to tender a bond justified the court in refusing to grant the executrix letters, and it properly granted letters to an administrator with the will annexed. In this case the court said: "She permitted more than twelve months to elapse, during which she could have obtained letters testamentary upon applying for them. If there be an explanation, or excuse for the delay, offered, it lies in the fact that she was advised probate of the will in this state was unnecessary; if the fact be conceded, it is significant only that she did not intend to claim, or exercise in this state, the right to letters testamentary. Aggregating the facts, we are forced to the conclusion that she never intended taking probate of the will, or letters testamentary, in this state, subjecting herself and the estate and its administration to the proper tribunals of this state, until she was quickened by the grant of administration to the appellee; and that her conduct was a renunciation of the right to letters testamentary conferred by the laws of this state, a renunciation she was without capacity to retract. If this be not true, the statutes so carefully framed, and explicitly manifesting the policy of the state, to avoid vacuums in the administrations of estates, of prolonged, indefinite continuance, dependent on the diligence or the caprice of those who may have a privity of right, are vain." The court does not discuss the effect of delay on the matter of probate, but only on the matter of the right to letters. A further and potent reason for this decision was the failure of the executrix to give any bond when she applied for letters.

In Besancon v. Brownson, 39 Mich. 388, it was said that a probate of a second will should be granted without setting aside the probate of the first will. In this case the probate of the first will from another state was probated in Michigan five years after the testator's death, and six years after his death the probate of a later will was offered in Michigan. (See 57 L. R. A.

subd. VI., Second wills and codicils.) In this case the second will was a holographic will. The court said: "If the probate court was possessed of authority to probate the second will, we have no hesitation in saying there was no authority in this case to revoke the earlier probate."

In Walton v. Ambler, 29 Neb. 626, 45 N. W. 931, a will was probated in Iowa in 1874 and in Nebraska in 1887. It was claimed by a legatee that a contract of partition made in 1874 was not binding as to land in Nebraska, and that she could not make any conveyance until after probate. It was held that in order to show title in the legatees the will must have been probated in Nebraska, but that the want of such probate did not preclude the plaintiff from selling all her interest in the estate. Neb. Comp. Stat. chap. 23, §§ 144, 145, provides that when a copy of a will and the probate thereof, duly authenticated from another state, is produced to the probate court, notice of hearing shall be given in the same manner as in case of an original will presented for probate.

In Doe ex dem. Pope v. Pickett, 51 Ala. 584, in an action of ejectment, it was held that a will probated in Alabama in 1846 and probated in Georgia in 1840 was competent evidence of title. No question seems to have been made as to delay. In this case a transcript of the Georgia probate was recorded in Alabama in 1841, and regularly probated in Alabama in 1846. The probate in Georgia was defective, but the later probate supplied the deficiency.

X. Statutory limitations.

Ala. act 1806 (Clay's Dig. 1898, § 6), providing that any will that has been admitted to probate may be contested within five years, was held to limit the time for probating a second will. Watson v. Turner, 89 Ala. 225, 8 So. 20; Hardy v. Hardy, 26 Ala. 524.

Under Conn. Stat. 209, t. 32, chap. 1, § 39, which provides that a will shall not be probated more than ten years after the death of the testator, and saves to infants three years after attaining their majority, it was held that a will that was fifteen years old could not be probated after all the devisees had attained their majority more than three years prior to the offering for probate. Goodman v. Russ, 14 Conn. 210.

In Harrell v. Hamilton, 6 Ga. 37, where the testator died July 26, 1846, and on November 3 the will was offered for probate and a caveat was filed on the ground that under the act of 1755 all wills were required to be recorded within three months after the death of the testator, it was held that the act was inoperative because inconsistent with provisions of subsequent recording acts. It was further held that the will could not be admitted to record until it was proved to be the will of the testator, which is done before a court of ordinary, and frequently after the contest is made, through an appeal to the superior court, and the will is established. The court said that more than three months in most cases would lapse before the will could be proved and ordered to be entered of record.

Kan. Comp. Laws 1879, chap. 117, § 29, providing that no lands shall pass to any devisee in a will who shall have the same in his control for three years, unless within that time it shall be offered for probate, was held not to bar the probate of a will nine years old, where it was a joint will and the probate judge had informed the surviving husband that it could not be probated until the death of his wife. Allen v. Allen, 28 Kan. 18.

The case of REID v. BERGE, asserting that a will may be probated at any time within ten years after the death of the testator, follows Allen v. Froman, 96 Ky. 313, 28 S. W. 497. In that case it was held that a lapse of ten years barred an action in the circuit court to admit to record a copy of a will executed in another state but not there probated, and that the action was barred by Ky. Gen. Stat. chap. 71, § 9, art. 3, providing that an action for relief not provided for in this or some other chapter can only be commenced within ten years next after the cause of action accrued. This interpretation of this statute seems to conflict with a case in New York holding that an action to establish a lost will more than twenty years after the death of the testator was not barred by 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 2d ed. 229, § 52, providing that bills for relief, in case of the existence of a trust, not cognizable by the courts of common law, and in all other cases not herein provided for, shall be filed within ten years after the cause thereof shall accrue. Everitt v. Everitt, 41 Barb. 385, Affirmed Commission Appeals, 6 Alb. L. J. 197. The actions for relief were similar, but the Kentucky cases were controlled by Gen. Stat. chap. 21, § 27, which provided that "the term 'action' when used in this revision shall be construed to include all proceedings in any court of this commonwealth." The result in the Everitt Case was reached by construing "bills for relief" in their strict, legal, and technical sense, and holding that there was a distinction to be found in the books upon equity pleadings between bills which pray for relief and those which do not pray for relief, and that the complaint praying that the will may be proved and its validity established to the end that it might be admitted to record did not seek to restrain the defendants from doing acts, nor to establish any rights, and, "in short, it asks no relief, in the technical sense of the word, against any of the defendants."

In Allen v. Froman, 96 Ky. 313, 28 S. W. 497, supra, a copy of a will from Alabama was offered for probate. The testator died in Alabama in 1868. The will was not probated in Alabama, but the copy was offered in Kentucky in 1890. The court said: "We can see no reason why a period of time should not be fixed for probating wills as well as for instituting or commencing any other action or proceeding for relief; for fraud may be perpetrated in the matter of probating wills by reason of the death of witnesses to the transaction, and innocent purchasers disturbed and deprived of property honestly acquired, by setting up false wills after a long lapse of time, as can occur in any other case. So, as held by this court in Hoffert v. Miller, 86 Ky. 572, 6 S. W. 447, it has become legislative policy of this state to fix in every case a limit of time for beginning every action or proceeding for relief, and § 9, art. 3, was intended for that purpose. Probating and recording the will in question is necessary to enable appellee to maintain an action for recovery of the land from the heirs at law of George Coll, who, or their vendees, have been in actual possession and claiming it as their own since 1870; and to permit appellee, now thirty-nine years old, to institute and maintain this proceeding twenty-two years after death of George Coll, under whose will he claims, would, it seems to us, be contrary to the reason of the statute of limitation, as well as to the direct provision thereof."

N. Y. Rev. Stat. 749, § 3, and N. Y. Code Civ. Proc., § 2628, provides that purchasers in good faith shall not be affected by the probate of a will more than four years after the death of the testator, and gives an exception to minors, or where the will had been concealed. It was held that a will nineteen years old could not be probated where the minor had reached majority more than five years prior to the probate. Cole v. Gourlay, 79 N. Y. 527.

And under this statute, in Fox v. Fee, 167 N. Y. 44, 60 N. E. 281, the saving clause in favor of infants was held not to apply to heirs begotten after the death of the testator. But see, on this statute, Gilkinson v. Miller, 74 Fed. 131, subd. II.

Me. Rev. Stat. chap. 164, § 1, limiting the probate to twenty years from the death of the testator, was held not to apply where the will had been fraudulently concealed. Deake's Appeal, 80 Me. 50, 12 Atl. 790.

Miss. Rev. Code 1871, § 2393, providing that after six months have elapsed from the time of speaking the pretended testamentary words no testimony shall be received unless such words, or the substance thereof, shall have been reduced to writing within six days after speaking the same, was held to mean that the will had to be reduced to writing within six days if not offered for probate within six months, but that if offered for probate within that time the six-days clause did not apply. George v. Greer, 53 Miss. 495.

Ohio Rev. Stat. § 5943, provides that no lands shall pass to any devisee in a will who shall know of the existence thereof and have the same in his power to control for the term of three years, unless within that time he shall cause the same to be offered for or admitted to probate; and by such neglect the estate devised to such devisee shall descend to the heirs of the testator. In Williams v. Schatz, 42 Ohio St. 47, a deed in the nature of a testamentary disposition was held void as a deed for want of delivery, and, referring to this section of the statute, the court said: "A will in Ohio is of no force until admitted to probate, and probate of this instrument is barred. (2 Swan & C. 1621, § 32, Rev. Stat. § 5943)." But it was held in Blymeyers's Will, Goebel, 14, that the failure, for three years, by the devisee to present the will for probate did not prevent its admission to probate, for then the question is whether it is the last will, and not what interest passes. This appears to be the proper interpretation of this statute.

Notwithstanding Tex. Rev. Stat. art. 1828, limiting the time to four years within which to probate a will, a will was probated eleven years after the testator's death to establish a chain of title where the plaintiff did not have control of the will. Ryan v. Texas & P. R. Co. 64 Tex. 239.

And under this statute a probate was allowed four years and nine months after the death of the testator, where an attempt was made to probate shortly after the death of the testator in behalf of the party interested, but who was not made a party to the record until four years and nine months after the death of the testator. Elwell v. Universalist General Convention, 76 Tex. 514, 13 S. W. 552.

The title of a mortgage for value was not affected by a will that was not discovered until six months after the death of the testator, under East Riding registry act, 6 Anne, chap. 35, providing for the registration of wills within six months after the death of the testator. Chadwick v. Turner, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 310, 35 L. J. Ch. N. S. 349, 12 Jur. N. S. 239, 14 L. T. N. S. 86, 14 Week. Rep. 491.

The English probate act 1857, § 30, authorizes rules for the regulation of practice. Rule 45, P. R., provides: "In every case where probate or administration is for the first time applied for after the lapse of three years from the death of the deceased, the reason of the delay is to be certified to the registrars, and, should the certificate be unsatisfactory, the registrars are to require such proof of the alleged cause of delay as they may see fit."

XI. Summary.

In the absence of statute and of intervening equities, it seems that the right to probate a will is not extinguished by lapse of time, although vaguely referred to in some cases as limited by thirty years. This period is that usually fixed by the English rule for probating a will in solemn form, i. e., on notice to all parties. But in that case, as in all the others, the period may be cut down to a very limited time by estoppel. The probate is usually allowed in the absence of a prohibitory statute, leaving the devisees to obtain their rights in other actions for relief. In many of the states the time within which a will may be probated is fixed by statute. In Allen v. Froman, 96 Ky. 313, 28 S. W. 497, followed in Reid v. Buxton, where there was no specific statute, a general section providing that an action for relief not provided for can only be commenced within ten years was held to apply to the probate of a will. A similar statute was differently construed in Everitt v. Everitt, 41 Barb. 385, Affirmed Commission Appeal, 6 Alb. L. J. 197. The cases on the rights of a purchaser for value as against the devisee are mostly controlled by statute. It seems that there is no case clearly defining the rights of a purchaser in good faith for value after the lapse of a long period of time, in the absence of statute or of disability of devisees, unless it should be one where the element of estoppel occurred. Under statutes providing a short limitation there is generally an exception in favor of persons under disabilities, such as minors. Such a statute has been held not to apply to grandchildren not begotten at the time of the testator's death. Usually statutes limiting the time of probate make an exception in favor of wills that have been concealed. There seems to be no difference as to the effect of delay in probating a will, whether it be a first or second will, or a codicil. I. T.

(March 17, 1900.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Grant County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Simrall & Galois and A. G. De Jarnett for appellants.

Mr. W. W. Dickerson for appellee.

Hobson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee filed this suit to recover for the loss of the life of his intestate by reason of the negligence of appellant's servants. The answer was substantially a traverse of the allegations of the petition, and at the conclusion of appellee's evidence, as well as on all the evidence, appellant asked a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for him, which was refused. The proof showed that appellee's intestate was seventeen years old, 6 feet high, and weighed about 140 pounds; that he was going to school at Corinth, Kentucky; that on a number of occasions he had been allowed by the crew of appellant's local freight train to ride on the train free, and assist them in loading and unloading freight; that on the day on which he was killed this train, after arriving at Corinth, unloaded the freight for that point; that in this freight was a box of matches, which took fire, and the conductor took the box out behind the depot to get at the fire and put it out; that while he was doing this the brakemen proceeded to put on the freight that was to be loaded at that point; that, among other things, a piano was to be loaded, and one of the brakemen requested the intestate and another boy, of about the same age, who was with him, a few feet away, to come and help them load the piano on the train. The piano was rolled to the door of the depot, which was about 4 feet above the platform, on the outside. Two of the brakemen got on one side of the piano, and the third brakeman and the two boys on the other side. They rolled the piano out of the door, with the intention of carrying it across the platform to the car; but when it left the door it either slipped from the two brakemen, or the weight was too heavy for them to carry, and fell to the platform, catching the intestate under it, and so mashing him that he died from his injuries a few days later. The conductor was not present, and knew nothing of what was going on until after the piano had fallen on the intestate; being out behind the depot, working on the box of matches.

The question in this case is whether the railroad company is responsible for the injury to the boy, received while voluntarily assisting the brakemen in discharging their duties. The rule on this subject is thus expressed in Wood, Mast. & S. § 455: "A person who voluntarily, and without any employment, undertakes to perform a service for another, stands in the same relation as a servant for the time being, and is regarded as assuming all the risks incident to the business. And this is so even though the service is not wholly voluntary, but is induced by the request of a servant in the defendant's employ. Thus, where the plaintiff was sent by his master with a cart to the defendant's premises to get a load of cotton, and one of the defendant's servants requested him to assist in loading it, and while he was doing so he was injured by one of the defendant's servants negligently letting a bale fall upon him, it was held that an action could not be maintained; Erle, Ch. J., pertinently saying: "This is the case of one volunteering to associate himself with another's servants in the performance of the defendant's work, and this without the consent or knowledge even of the defendant." Such a person cannot stand in a better position than those with whom he associates himself, in respect to the master's liability." The same rule is laid down in 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 182; 1 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 325. In Church v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (Minn.) 16 L. R. A. 861, the learned editor, citing a large number of authorities, thus well states the rule: "One who has no interest in the performance of the work which he undertakes, whether of his own volition, or at the suggestion of others engaged in the work, and merely to assist them in its performance, is a volunteer, and assumes all the risks of the employment, and cannot recover for injuries occasioned by an accident happening through the neglect of those with whom he is acting." There are a large number of cases supporting this rule. Thus, where the fireman of an engine asked a boy to put in the hose and turn in the water at a station, and the boy was killed while acting for the fireman, under circumstances not entitling the fireman to recover if he had been in the place of the boy, it was held that there could be no recovery. Flower v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 69 Pa. 210, 8 Am. Rep. 251. So, where a boy was hurt in coupling cars. New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Harrison, 48 Miss. 112, 12 Am. Rep. 356. So, where the plaintiff was assisting the defendant's servants in delivering a fly wheel, and by their negligence the wheel was allowed to fall on him. Wischam v. Rickards, 136 Pa. 109, 10 L. R. A. 97, 20 Atl. 532. So where the plaintiff, at the request of the brakeman, undertook to help them operate the brakes on the train. Mayton v. Texas & P. R. Co. 63 Tex. 77, 51 Am. Rep. 637; Evarts v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 56 Minn. 141, 22 L. R. A. 663, 57 N. W. 459. In notes to these cases numbers of other cases are collected. The same principles were announced by this court, except as to children too young to understand the danger, in Kentucky C. R. Co. v. Gastineau, 83 Ky. 119. Under these authorities, there can be no recovery for the injury to the intestate, unless the fact that he was an infant takes this case out of the rule. He was seventeen years of age, and well grown for his years. The danger from the fall of a piano was apparent, and there is nothing in the record to warrant the conclusion that he had not sufficient discretion to be held responsible for the consequences of his acts. The rule is that a minor in entering a service assumes, like the adult, the risks of that service, unless too young to appreciate the peril to which he is exposed. 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 218. In a note to this section are collected several cases in which this rule was applied to boys fifteen or sixteen years of age. In Kelly v. Barber Asphalt Co. 93 Ky. 363, 20 S. W. 271, this court sustained a peremptory instruction where the boy was in his seventeenth year. The brakemen had no authority to call in others to help them in their work, and while it was their duty not to place children, or suffer them to remain, in places of peril, where by reason of their inexperience they would reasonably be exposed to injury, and appellant would be answerable for negligence on the brakemen's part if they did so, this duty is the same as everyone owes to that character of persons on his premises, and the principle has no application where one who is substantially a young man undertakes to help another lift a piano. There is therefore nothing in the case to take it out of the general rule exempting the master from liability to one who is injured, while helping his servants at their request, by reason of their negligence; and the court should have instructed the jury to find for appellant.

There was no error in not removing the cause to the Federal court, one of the defendants being a resident of this state. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Dixon, 104 Ky. 608, 47 S. W. 615. But for the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to grant appellant a new trial, and for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

ERROR to the District Court for Barton County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of certain grain which had been delivered by plaintiff to defendants. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Elrick C. Cole, for plaintiffs in error:

The placing of the grain in a common mass with wheat belonging to defendants and others did not change the nature of this transaction from a bailment to a sale.

Sexton v. Graham, 53 Iowa, 181, 4 N. W. 1090; Rice v. Nizon, 97 Ind. 97, 49 Am. Rep. 430; James v. Plank, 48 Ohio St. 255, 26 N. E. 1107; Ledyard v. Hibbard, 48 Mich. 421, 42 Am. Mr. William Osmond, for defendant in error:

Where there has been a complete change in the identity of the grain by substitution, so that no part of the original grain is left, the party depositing the grain may treat the transaction as a sale.

Where property is delivered to a party with the understanding that property of the same kind will be returned or the property paid for, as in the case of storage of grain in warehouse or elevator, the transaction is a sale, and not a bailment.

Cunningham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Moses Bros. Grain Company was, in October, 1898, engaged in the business of buying and selling, handling, and storing grain at Great Bend, Kansas, and for that purpose owned and operated an elevator and storage building at that place. In carrying on this business it was its custom, when grain was brought to it for storage, to mingle the same with other grain of like quality belonging to the company and to other persons, and from such commingled mass to withdraw for sale such portions at such times as it might desire. Upon the grain stored by it it charged and received certain storage fees. In said month of October Mrs. Teetors, by her agent, one Wilson, brought to the elevator 1,012½ bushels of wheat, which was received by the company under the terms of written receipts, then given therefor, all of like form, one of which is in the following language:

Great Bend, Kansas, 10/18/98.

Load of ——— Test 56. Price per bu., .48. Sold to Moses Bros. Grain Co. Stored at owner's risk of fire. Ed. Moses.

These receipts were not issued in this form at the time the wheat was brought to the elevator, for Mr. Wilson did not then know whether he would sell or store it, but afterwards, in a few days, he concluded to store it, and then the tickets were taken to the company, and there was written across these tickets the words, "Stored at owner's risk of fire." The contract was one for storage, and not of sale. This wheat was not placed in a bin by itself, but was mingled with a common mass of grain of like quality in the elevator, as was the custom. Mr. Wilson well knew the custom of the grain company relative to storing grain, and its sale, and did not expect to receive back the identical wheat which he stored with the company, and we assume the fact to be that this identical wheat was sold by the grain company in its ordinary course of business. In the latter part of December, 1898, the company's elevator was burned, it then containing wheat of like quality as that stored by Mrs. Teetors, enough to have repaid her as well as others; and it fairly appears from the evidence that this had been the case all the while from the time she so deposited it up to the time of the fire. After the fire the grain company took the proper care of the injured grain, and tendered to Mrs. Teetors her share of the salvage thereof. This she refused, however, and brought her action against the company to recover for the full value of the 1,012½ bushels of wheat, which she alleged to be worth 60 cents per bushel. The court rendered judgment in her favor, and against the grain company, and it is now here seeking a reversal of this judgment.

It is agreed by the parties that the relation existing between Mrs. Teetors and the grain company was that of bailor and bailee, and that the mingling of Mrs. Teetors' wheat with that of the grain company did not change the character of the bail-cases in note thereto. As the grain in the present case was explicitly stored "at owner's risk of fire," the decision holding that the sale of the specific grain that was deposited did not prevent the continuance of a bailment under which grain of equal amount in the common mass was held as that of the depositor, and subject to such risks, seems entirely consistent 57 L. R. A.

with the general trend of authorities like that of Hall v. Pillsbury (Minn.) 7 L. R. A. 529, holding that the bailment continues notwithstanding the removal of the identical grain first deposited and that the holders of receipts for grain so deposited are tenants in common of the mass of grain in the warehouse.

ment, or convert that bailment into a sale; and it is further admitted that in such mingling the respective owners were tenants in common of the entire mass, but it is claimed by Mrs. Teetors that the sale by the grain company of the identical wheat deposited by Mrs. Teetors had the legal effect to make the grain company liable to her for the full value of the wheat, if she should elect to require money rather than a return of wheat. This contention leads us to a consideration of the principles of bailment involved, as applied to elevators and warehousemen.

It is contended by the grain company that, inasmuch as Mrs. Teetors knew of their custom in the matter of selling grain, that custom must be read into the contract expressed by the receipts given, and make the contract to be that she was to receive, in satisfaction of her demand for the grain whenever it should be made, not the identical grain she had deposited, but any other grain of the same quality, and that in the meantime her ownership would be in the particular grain of the same quality found in the grain company's bins. In other words, that her ownership was a shifting and substituted one. In support of this theory, plaintiff in error cites many cases. In the case of Rice v. Nixon, 97 Ind. 97, 49 Am. Rep. 430, the defendant was a warehouseman, and it was his custom to receive wheat on deposit and to place it in a common bin with wheat bought by him, and to sell from such common mass as he chose, of which custom plaintiff had knowledge. Plaintiff's wheat was put into the bin in accordance with defendant's custom. From this common mass he sold from time to time. The warehouse and its contents were destroyed by fire without the negligence of the defendant, no demand having been made by the plaintiff for the return of the wheat prior to the fire. The facts of this case seem fairly parallel with the facts of the case at bar. The conclusion of law, as founded upon these facts, is stated in the syllabus as follows: "Where a warehouseman receives grain to be stored for the owner, and places it in a common bin with his own and that received from other depositors, and sells from this receptacle, retaining always sufficient to supply each owner, the contract continues one of bailment, and the warehouseman is not liable for a loss resulting from an accidental fire not attributable to his own wrong or negligence." In James v. Plank, 48 Ohio St. 255, 26 N. E. 1107, the law announced was that in cases of this kind, where the owner of grain deposited with a warehouseman knew of the custom among warehousemen to mingle wheat brought to them for storage with like wheat owned by the warehouseman, and that from such common mass the warehouseman had the right to take out of the contents for sale, and that he at all times kept on hand an amount sufficient to satisfy all depositors, such a transaction was but a bailment, and not a sale, and the warehouseman would not be liable to the owner of the wheat if, under such circumstances, the wheat had been destroyed by fire without his negligence. The same doctrine is announced in Sexton v. Graham, 53 Iowa, 181, 4 N. W. 1090, which case was followed under similar circumstances in Nelson v. Brown, 53 Iowa, 555, 5 N. W. 719. The case of Rice v. Nixon, 97 Ind. 97, 49 Am. Rep. 430, has been cited and followed in a number of Indiana cases since, some of which are as follows: Lyon v. Lenon, 106 Ind. 567, 7 N. E. 311; Morningstar v. Cunningham, 110 Ind. 328, 59 Am. Rep. 211, 11 N. E. 593; Woodward v. Semans, 125 Ind. 330, 25 N. E. 444; Drudge v. Leiter, 18 Ind. App. 694, 49 N. E. 34. In this last case it is held, as applied to cases of this kind, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the usages of a particular business may be presumed to have entered into and formed a part of the contracts and understandings of persons engaged in such business and those who deal with them. In Yockey v. Smith, 181 Ill. 564, 54 N. E. 1048, oats and corn were deposited with one Harrington, who operated an elevator, buying, selling, and shipping grain on his own account, and receiving grain from farmers for storage in his elevator. The grain so stored was taken upon execution against Harrington, and the court held that the grain was not subject to be taken upon execution for Harrington's debts, for the grain so stored remained the property of the bailor, the bailee being charged with the duty to return in quality and quantity as they had received. This case cites with approval German Nat. Bank v. Meadowcroft, 95 Ill. 124, 35 Am. Rep. 137, where it was held that grain consigned to a public warehouse, and there stored in bins and mingled with other grain of like character and grade belonging to different persons, although its identity was lost, could be recovered in an action in trover; the warehouseman having refused to deliver to the owner the quantity and quality stored. We are cited by the defendant in error to several cases which, she contends, support her theory of the case. Chase v. Washburn, 1 Ohio St. 244, 59 Am. Dec. 623, decided by the supreme court of Ohio in 1853, was a case where the defendant in error deposited with the warehouseman a quantity of wheat. The warehouse was subsequently destroyed by fire, and the bailee refused to pay for the wheat, and it was there held that, if the bailee shipped the wheat and appropriated the same to his own use, in violation of the terms of the bailment, upon the burning of his warehouse he would become liable to the bailor for the value of the property, and that, inasmuch as, under the facts of this case, it was found that the bailee had a right to return the specific article or pay its price at his option, he was in law a purchaser, and was answerable for the value of the grain to the bailor. This case would be one in point with the case at bar were it established that the grain company had the option to pay the price instead of returning the wheat upon demand to Mrs. Teetors. The same is true of Rahilly v. Wilson, 3 Dill. 420, Fed. Cas. No. 11,532, a case decided in 1873. Bailey v. Bensley, 87 Ill. 556, is also cited. This case arose upon the claim of a grain buyer against a firm of commission merchants doing business in Chicago. We fail to see the applicability of this case to the case at bar. Loneragan v. Stewart, 55 Ill. 44, is a case in which the same principle which is announced in the case of Chase v. Washburn, 1 Ohio St. 244, 59 Am. Dec. 623, is involved, and that case is cited and approved. Richardson v. Olmstead, 74 Ill. 213, is a case of the same character, and announces the same principle in the following language: "Where grain is received by a dealer into his warehouse, under a contract to pay the owner the market price on any day he may choose to call for it, and such grain is mixed with other grain in bins, from which shipments are being made every day, the dealer becomes the owner of the grain, and liable to pay for it whenever called on, and is not a mere bailee." This case also cites Chase v. Washburn, 1 Ohio St. 244, 59 Am. Dec. 623, and Loneragan v. Stewart, 55 Ill. 44. We do not think that these cases, under their facts, are applicable to the case at bar, because it appears, from the fact that this wheat was stored at "owner's risk of fire," that both bailor and bailee recognized the fact that the title to the wheat remained in the bailor; for if by this transaction title had passed to the bailee, how could it be stored at owner's risk? Or what would have been the sense of this provision if they had contemplated that her ownership should end by the sale of this wheat by the grain company in the ordinary course of its business, which might occur the very day the wheat was stored, and had perhaps occurred before these words were written upon the receipts, which was some days after the wheat had been delivered? The term "owner" in the receipt clearly means Mrs. Teetors. And, more than this, one of the defendants testified that if a party who had stored wheat wished to withdraw the same the company would turn out the same quantity of wheat that had been stored. From all of the evidence it appears quite plain to us that the case was tried upon the theory that the title to the wheat remained in Mrs. Teetors. It is probable that both parties had an idea that the wheat would never be redelivered, but whether it should be or not would depend upon future and further negotiations. The general rule of bailment is well understood, that where a bailee for hire puts it beyond his power to return the identical property bailed he thereby becomes a debtor to the bailor in the amount of the value of the thing bailed, but in a contract such as the one in this case at bar conditions widely depart from those upon which the general rule is based. Here it was clearly understood, based in part upon the conversation had with Mr. Wilson and in part upon Mr. Wilson's knowledge of the general course of the grain business, that the identical wheat which Mrs. Teetors deposited in the warehouse might not, and probably never would be returned; that the grain company had a right to sell it, and that its contract to return would be fully discharged if, upon demand therefor, it turned over to Mrs. Teetors wheat of like quantity and amount. Every consideration of the case would compel to this understanding, for it must have been clear to Mr. Wilson that the grain company was not expecting to, nor, indeed, could not, provide separate bins or storage receptacles for each several lot of wheat. Warehouses and elevators are of great public utility. It is a matter of general knowledge that a great portion of the grain business of the country is transacted through and by them. This could not be done if it was required that the identical grain deposited by any owner should be returned upon demand, or, in default thereof, the warehouseman would be chargeable with the price thereof at the time the demand was made. But the rule that the warehouseman may discharge his obligation to the owner by delivering to him grain of like quality and amount when he shall demand it is fair and just, and in accordance with the terms of the understanding and agreement. This is not unjust to the owner. He may protect himself against loss by fire by procuring insurance, and he is protected from the creditors of the warehouseman, who may not take upon execution against him grain in store to such an extent that the owner may not obtain his own. In short the contract is one, to coin a term which seems fit, of substituted ownership, wherein, as soon as the identical grain which has been deposited by the owner is disposed of by the warehouseman, other grain of the same quality and quantity takes its place, and so on from time to time until the owner shall receive back his grain, or other arrangements are made for its disposition. This rule is just, equitable, and fair, permitting facility and ease in handling crops of grain, while it protects the interests of all parties. It seems that the court below took the view that as soon as the identical grain deposited by Mrs. Teetors with the grain company was disposed of by it there arose on its part a promise to pay for its value, and upon this theory rendered the judgment it did. As we have said, this is a correct general theory, but we do not think it applicable to the facts of this case.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

NEW ORLEANS COLD STORAGE COM-

(107 La. 172.)

- *1. The undertaking of the cold storer being to preserve goods liable to undergo or actually undergoing deterioration through the development in them of insect life, it is not necessary, in order to recover against him for damage to goods, to prove more than that the goods, when delivered into his cold storage, were, according to the usual and ordinary test of commerce, sound.
 2. For the deterioration of the goods while in his cold storage he is responsible, notwithstanding that in the heading of the receipt issued for the goods there is printed a limited liability clause, to the effect that he is not responsible for "damage" to goods.
 3. Interested persons are by our law competent witnesses, and their testimony is binding on the court, unless overcome by counter testimony, or irreconcilable with the known facts of the case.
 4. The warehouseman has a right to hold possession of the goods stored with him until the amount due him for storage is paid.
 5. The amount due for storage on goods cannot be compensated by an unliquidated claim for damage suffered by the goods.
- On Rehearing.*
6. A cold storage company may by contract limit its liability to the extent that liability may be limited.
 7. The limited liability clause should be specific, and include in its terms all damages and acts for which the cold storer does not hold himself responsible.
 8. A paper admitted in evidence without objection will be taken as the commencement of proof of a particular fact.
 9. The holder of the receipt is entitled to delivery of the property stored upon tender of payment of charges on the property itself, and payment of charges on other property of owner cannot be required before delivery. There must be a tender made, in due form, of the charges.
 10. Storage is due on damaged goods for which the storer is made to pay.

Messrs. McGloskey & Benedict for appellee.

Provosty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Having on hand large quantities of cowpeas, and June coming on, when cowpeas are in danger of being damaged by weevils in the climate of New Orleans, the plaintiffs separated the mixed peas from the straight clay peas, and put the latter, the more valuable, in the cold storage warehouse of the defendant company for preservation until the opening of the next season,—say, March following. The quantity thus stored was 13,028 sacks, and the transfer to the cold storage was effected between the 9th and the 18th of June. Afterwards (a few days more than a month afterwards), between the 19th and 30th of July, plaintiffs transferred to the same cold storage what they still had on hand of the mixed peas, namely, 2,099 sacks. In the course of the following season, plaintiffs withdrew the peas from the cold storage as the requirements of their trade demanded, until the defendant refused to make further deliveries, claiming the right to hold the peas for unpaid storage; and thereupon the plaintiffs immediately brought the present suit. This was in July, 1898,—a year after the peas had been stored. Plaintiffs allege that, of the peas withdrawn, 642 sacks were damaged, and had to be sold for $433.19, instead of $1,249.96, the regular price, and that defendant owes them the difference, viz., $816.77; the damage having come about through its fault. And they allege further that the defendant refuses to deliver to them the remainder of the 13,028 sacks of peas, namely, 1,250 sacks; that the same are damaged to such an extent as to have lost all value; that the damage came about through the fault of defendant; and that defendant owes the value, viz., $2,458.33. And plaintiffs allege further that, of the 2,099 sacks of peas, defendant still holds and refuses to deliver 1,360 sacks, and owes the value, $616.05. Plaintiffs do not say that these 1,360 sacks are in any worse condition than they were when put in cold storage. The defendant denies that it has been in fault, avers its right to detain the cowpeas until payment of the amount due for storage, and claims in reconviction the amount thus due, namely, $1,890.65. At the request of the plaintiffs the peas detained by defendant were sold by the sheriff soon after the institution of this suit. The 1,250 sacks sold for $431.72, and the 1,360 sacks for $198.98.

The business of the defendant is to preserve perishable articles by means of cold air. Articles received by defendant for preservation are supposed to be liable to undergo or to be actually undergoing a process of deterioration through the development in them of insect life, and the undertaking of defendant, for which it is paid more than quadruple the price of ordinary warehousing, is to prevent or arrest this process. In order to recover against defendant, therefore, it is not necessary for plaintiffs to show that their goods were not affected by insect life when put in cold storage, or that the process of deterioration had not begun in said goods, but that said goods, by the usual and ordinary test of commerce, were classed as sound. The two plaintiffs and Mr. McMillan testify positively and emphatically that they tested every sack of the peas,—this test being made as the peas were being hauled to the cold storage,—and found the peas to be perfectly sound. The interest of these witnesses detracts from the weight of their testimony (Mr. McMillan has against the defendant a claim similar to that of the plaintiffs); but the witnesses are three in number; they are by our law competent witnesses; they are business men of this city; and, after all allowances have been made, their testimony is binding on the court. The supposition of these witnesses having been mistaken is excluded by the fact that they were large dealers in peas, entirely competent to test the peas, and by the further fact that the testing of the soundness of a pea is a very simple matter,—a sound pea being cold, and a weevily pea hot. The superintendent of the cold storage testified to the machinery of the cold storage having run perfectly while the peas were in cold storage, and a large number of dealers in different kinds of perishable articles who had goods in the cold storage during the time that the peas of the plaintiffs were there testified to their goods having been properly preserved; and we have no doubt at all that the machinery of the cold storage was properly run. The peas, then, having been sound when put in, and the machinery having run regularly, it must be that the damage to the peas occurred before the cold had penetrated sufficiently to arrest deterioration. If so, defendant is responsible; for it was its business to know what quantity of peas it could safely admit at one time into its cold storage. This responsibility of the defendant the superintendent of the cold storage, Mr. Scratchly, was alive to, for we find him cautious about letting in the peas too fast. "Saw Mr. Scratchly," says Mr. McMillan, "and asked him whether he couldn't take them a little more rapidly, as we wanted to get them in; and he said they were having a little difficulty with the temperature, keeping it down to where it should be, and he would only take in a certain amount a day, as he didn't want to endanger the temperature of the warehouse."

We can explain the deterioration of the peas in no other way than by assuming that the superintendent was not cautious enough, and did "endanger" the temperature of his cold storage by letting in the peas too fast, or in too great quantities. The largest quantity the defendant had ever stored previously was from 6,000 to 7,000 sacks, whereas this time, in the brief space between the 9th and 18th of June, it undertook to accommodate 13,028 sacks for plaintiffs and 26,099 sacks for McMillan & Co. There is evidence that the peas were stored too much in a pile, and we must say this evidence is but very faintly contradicted by Mr. Scratchly. Of the 13,028 sacks of peas, 5,422 were transferred into the cold storage directly from the cars that had brought them from Tennessee, and 7,606 were transferred from the warehouse of Holmes & Co., in this city. The peas transferred from the cars came out of the cold storage all sound. Defendant argues that since all the peas from the cars came out sound, and the peas from the warehouse of Holmes & Co. came out damaged, it must be that not the cold storage, but the warehouse, is responsible for the damage. The argument, though possessing considerable force, is by no means conclusive. In the first place, not all the peas from the warehouse of Holmes & Co. came out of the cold storage damaged, but only some of them; 5,910 sacks came out sound,—a larger amount than the total quantity that came from the cars. The peas from the warehouse of Holmes & Co. which had been subjected for some time to the temperature of New Orleans, may have carried with them into the cold storage a greater quantity of heat than did the peas direct from Tennessee. Moreover, they may have been stored less advantageously.

The loss resulting to the plaintiffs from the deterioration of the 642 sacks of peas is not proved. As to these 642 sacks we must therefore nonsuit plaintiffs.

The defendant had a right to hold possession of the peas until the storage was paid. Civil Code, art. 2956. The storage could not be compensated by the plaintiffs' unliquidated claim for damages. Civil Code, art. 2209. Plaintiffs can therefore recover nothing for the 1,360 sacks that were in a damaged condition when put in the cold storage. It is not alleged that these 1,360 sacks deteriorated while in the warehouse of defendant. The only allegation is that defendant refused to deliver them up; and, since we have held that defendant properly so refused, we can allow the plaintiffs nothing on this demand.

The price for which the peas were sold belongs to plaintiffs, subject, however, to the pledge of the defendant to secure the amount due for storage. Of the 1,250 sacks, 1,054 were damaged. These were sold at 19½ cents per bushel. Had they been sound, they would have brought 36½ cents per bushel. Plaintiffs are entitled to recover from defendant the difference. There were 1,578 bushels, which, at 17 cents per bushel, the difference between 19½ and 36½, amounts to $268.26.

The sale made by the sheriff, having been made at the instance of the plaintiffs, was the act of the plaintiffs, for which the plaintiffs alone are responsible. This sale must be held to be the exact equivalent of a private sale made by the plaintiffs. As such, it measures the value of the peas at the time they were taken out of the cold storage and sold.

On the reconventional demand, defendant is entitled to judgment as prayed, with recognition of the depository's pledge on the price of the peas sold by the sheriff.

The defendant was sued on its general liability as a cold storer, and it answered by a general denial. It did not plead any special contract. But we find that in the heading of the receipts issued to the plaintiffs for the peas there is printed the following limited liability clause: "It is expressly understood and admitted that this company do not inspect or examine condition of goods in receiving same, and therefore are not responsible for contents or damage. It is also further understood that this company will not be responsible for variation in temperature that may arise by accident to machinery or other unforeseen causes. This company will make special contracts at increased rates above tariff when parties storing require guaranty of temperature. In this case goods will be inspected and examined at the expense and risk of storer. This company reserves in such special contracts that forty-eight hours' notice to the storer that machinery or building is disabled will terminate such contract and their responsibility under same. Not accountable for leakage, depreciation, or damage by rats." This clause is not specially insisted on in the brief, nor was it pressed in the argument; but, giving the defendant the full benefit of it, we do not think that it relieves defendant of its obligation, as cold storer, to preserve the goods in the condition in which they were when received.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment of the lower court be set aside, and that the plaintiffs have judgment against the defendant for the sum of $268.26, with 5 per cent per annum interest from this day. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the price of the sale made by the sheriff in this suit belongs to the plaintiffs, but that the same is subject to the privilege in favor of the defendant hereinafter decreed. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the demand of the plaintiffs for $816.97, difference in the price of the 642 sacks of peas sold as damaged, be rejected as in case of nonsuit. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendant have judgment against the plaintiffs for the sum of $1,896.65, with 5 per cent per annum interest thereon from the 18th day of October, 1898, and that to secure this judgment the defendant have a depository's privilege on the price of the sale made by the sheriff in this suit. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendant pay the costs of the main suit in the lower court and the costs of appeal, and that the plaintiffs pay the costs of the reconventional demand.

A rehearing having been granted, Breaux, J., on February 17, 1902, handed down the following additional opinion:

Application was made for a rehearing on a number of grounds which we considered sufficient to reopen the case and hear further argument.

Plaintiffs contended that the loss resulting from the deterioration of peas was amply shown, and that our decree should be amended so as to allow them an amount equal to this loss; secondly, that defendant had no right to hold possession of the property stored until all the charges had been paid, for the reason that plaintiffs were always willing to pay storage on any goods which they would withdraw, and the $1,290.59 admitted by plaintiffs in their petition to be due was for storage on the goods already withdrawn; that an amount claimed of $606.06, and heretofore allowed, was never earned; the charge was for preservation of goods, which had not been earned; that the price fixed in the decree for the peas was too low; and that it should be increased to an amount equal to the value of sound peas at the time. Defendant made no application for a rehearing, but in argument at bar, through its learned counsel, contended that all the issues should be reconsidered, and the whole claim rejected. There was much said by defendant's counsel in argument which was persuasive, in view of the restricted liability stipulated in the contract of storage between plaintiffs and the defendant. Heretofore it was considered that throughout the trial the burden of proof was with plaintiffs, in view of this contract. None the less, after having considered the evidence, the court concluded that its weight was with plaintiffs, and rendered its decree accordingly.

We are impressed by the argument of defendant's counsel, made with force and clearness at bar, that our decision would perhaps prove somewhat of a hindrance to the cold storage industry. In consequence, as relates to storage, we are moved to go over the entire ground again. The evidence, as heretofore considered, led us, we think, to a correct conclusion, although the practical observation of witnesses who testified in this case did not entirely accord with entomological science. We will point out the difference between the two. Our conclusion is that, in the main, the difference is not considerable. Practically, it was thought by the witnesses that the insects by which the peas were destroyed were a part of the pea, coming spontaneously from it, and growing with it, and that when it reached the perfect condition it flew away, committing no further damage. We have found, after consulting several authorities, that entomology teaches that in the early spring the female weevil (bruchus pisi, the pea weevil of the naturalist) fastens its egg upon the newly formed pod of the pea in a way that renders it difficult at first to find that the grain is attacked. The egg gives birth to a white larva, which feeds on the substance of the pea, and takes it life from it. The farinaceous substance of the grain is favorable to its growth, and it is while thus growing that the damage is done. When this larva passes into a perfect state the weevil bores through the pods, and, as a destroyer, commits no further damage, except in giving birth to eggs, which are inserted in the pea, as before mentioned. Cold storage will not destroy the weevil. It can only check its growth and development while in an embryo state. In winter the weevil finds shelter from the cold in the cracks of walls and other secluded places. It does not increase. The cold destroys many. In summer they invade the different cereals. They do not lay their eggs on the surface, but at some depth in the heaps of grain; a very minute dot on the surface of the pea being the only external evidence of the presence of a weevil larva. We infer that in this case the presence of the weevil or of its larva, and the extent of the damage, escaped the attention of the plaintiffs and the defendant. All agree that in cold air the weevil does not lay eggs, and the larva is harmless. But it takes a temperature of at least 10° centigrade to check their increase. Here cold storage becomes useful, and is, when the peas have been properly stored, some protection against damage by weevil. There are methods for destroying them that give rise to interesting study to the student of entomology. We are reminded by the necessity of some brevity that, although the subject is interesting, we must not pursue its study any further, and that we must limit our discussion to the work the cold storage undertakes when it receives peas on storage; and this, we think, we have done, by indicating the degree of temperature required to check the growth of insects of the weevil kind.

Our decision found that the heaps of peas were too large, and that the defendant did not sufficiently look after the ventilation of the cold air it controls. After a re-examination, we are not satisfied that an error has been committed. Defendant places great reliance upon the receipt it gave for the peas, and the limited liability clause printed therein. We understand that the defendant can limit its liability, and that those who sign the limited clause will be bound by its terms. But in this case oversight and negligence have been found, which are not covered by the limited liability clause of the receipt, and from which we do not understand, from the testimony, that it ever was the intention to relieve the defendant. Certainly the language used leads to such inference. One may stipulate waiver as extensive as he pleases, provided it does not contravene rules and laws enacted on grounds of public policy. The waiver must express the full extent intended. We take up for decision each item separately.

annexed to the plaintiffs' petition, and clearly shows that the cowpeas for which it accounts were sold from April 8, 1898, to July 22, 1898, for $433.19. This exhibit was offered in evidence contradictorily with defendant, who permitted it to be filed without objection. We think we are warranted in considering it to be properly before the court, and that it and other evidence show that plaintiffs are entitled to $689.28 on item represented by Statement A. If sound, they would have brought, it appears, 90 cents per bushel,—$1,122.47. They sold for $433.19. The difference they would have brought if not weevily is $689.28. In seeking to fix the value of these peas (not weevily when delivered to storage company), our attention was arrested by the testimony of a witness of the defendant who said that he in 1898 commenced selling peas at 90 cents. Mixed peas were sold for 75 cents per bushel; whip-poor-will at 85 cents. Another witness spoke of 80 cents as having been the selling price. True, plaintiffs' peas were of the better quality of clay peas, and worth from 10 cents to 25 cents more than the other. Taking the minimum of value of the ordinary and mixed peas and the minimum additional for the clay peas, we fix the price at 90 cents a bushel. It must be remarked that these peas were carried over by plaintiffs from the season of 1897 to be sold in 1898, when they were not as valuable, we infer from the testimony, as they were in 1897, and not as fresh as they were in the latter year.

The next ground of complaint is based on the refusal of the defendant to deliver the peas to plaintiffs before the storage was paid. Defendant held possession, and claims for storage while it held possession. Plaintiffs deny defendant's right to recover for this storage, because, as they aver, they offered to pay charges for storage, which they assert defendant refused to accept. Plaintiffs' contention is that separate negotiable warehouse receipts had been issued by the defendant for the peas; that defendant could not, in law, refuse to deliver the peas called for by one of the receipts, upon the ground that the storage on other peas which had been withdrawn on other receipts had not been paid. In other words, that it was not an advance made on the deposit, nor a claim arising from the deposit of the particular goods stored, which plaintiff wished to withdraw from storage. Plaintiffs say that they were willing to pay storage on the goods they desired to withdraw, but on none other, although, as we understand, there were other charges due. The statute (act No. 156 of 1886) is clear enough,—that on the presentation of a warehouse receipt properly indorsed, and the tender of charges upon the property represented by it, the holder of the receipt is entitled to the property it covers. While it is true that under the terms of this statute the holder of the receipt is entitled to delivery of the property upon the tender of payment of all charges on the particular property for which the receipt calls, yet there must be a tender in order to enable the holder of the receipt to recover damages growing out of delay in not delivering the goods, when delivery was timely and properly asked. Here there was no tender made. There was an offer such as is usual in a business community during the course of business, as will be seen from the following, which is copied from the testimony:

Cross-examination:

Q. Did you tender them in cash the amount of money due on those peas?

A. No, sir; not in cash.

Q. Did you tender them anything?

A. No, sir.

Clearly, this being the fact as relates to tender, plaintiffs continued to owe storage on the property which they did not offer to withdraw by making the tender the statute requires.

Plaintiffs claim the amount of $606.06 was for storage on the damaged goods. The complaint on this score is that plaintiffs were to pay four times the ordinary warehouse charges, and that, as defendant did not preserve the peas, it failed in performing its contract, and is, in consequence, not entitled to anything; that it should not recover compensation for failing to do that which it had bound itself to do. The defendant did not succeed in preserving the property, it is true, but at the same time it does not appear to us that there was such culpable negligence as renders it necessary to hold that it has lost all right to anything for the services it did render, although it failed. The property stored, although damaged, retained some of its value. Besides, defendant is condemned to pay its value; that is, to make up for the loss by paying the difference between sound and unsound peas. It should receive storage, on the theory that, if these peas had been sold in a sound state, defendant would have received storage.

Plaintiffs complain of the value of the peas as found by the court. The original opinion states (and this is not denied by plaintiffs) that it was at plaintiffs' request that the peas were sold at public auction.

The theory of the opinion was that plaintiffs had not complied with the statute cited supra with regard to tender, and that defendant was not alone at fault for the delays in disposing of the peas; that plaintiffs also had given them at least an implied assent, by not energetically demanding delivery of the property, and tendering the amount due thereon. We are not convinced that we should change that ruling, and recall all that has been heretofore held in that regard. Thirty-six and one-half cents remains as the price of sound peas. We have not found any good reason to increase the number of bushels from 1,578 to 2,108 bushels. The court concluded heretofore to adhere to the minimum number. We would not feel justified in changing the number unless it was manifest that an error had been committed. We do not change and increase the amount heretofore allowed for the peas sold by the sheriff, particularly, for the reason that the following, which appears of record, would not warrant an increase as relates to peas sold at sheriff's sale, far different from the other lots (we understand that this particular lot was weevily, to the knowledge of plaintiffs, when it was delivered to the cold storage warehouse): "It is admitted that this receipt calling for 2,029 sacks of peas on the reverse of which is written 730 sacks delivered by Marks and Rittner 1,569 sacks to the sheriff were stored in the warehouse as weevily peas on the date specified in the receipt." In view of this fact, we do not think that the price or the weight of the lot should be changed, for it may have been just as deficient in weight, as compared with sound peas, on the day it was delivered to the storage as on the day it was sold.

To conclude, then, plaintiffs are entitled to a judgment for $691.59, as above stated, with 5 per cent interest from this date; and to this extent the original judgment is amended, and in other respects it is affirmed; making, with the amount allowed in our original judgment, the sum of $959.85.

As amended, our original judgment is reinstated, and made the judgment of the court.

(March 6, 1902.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Baltimore City Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful ejection from defendant's car. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Fielder C. Slingluff, for appellant:

The ticket exhibited by the appellee was bought by his wife. She had no more right, under the contract she made with the railway company, to detach the tickets and give them to her husband, than she had to detach them and give them to her neighbors who did not have householders' tickets.

Western Maryland R. Co. v. Stocksedale, 83 Md. 253, 34 Atl. 880.

The public is interested in having the rules whereby conductors are to govern their actions certain and definite so that they may be enforced without confusion and without stopping the trains, and if the enforcement of a rule causes inconvenience to a passenger, who, by reason of mistake or otherwise, is without evidence as to his right to be a passenger, it is better that he should submit temporarily to the inconvenience than that the business of the road should be interrupted to the general annoyance of all who are on the train.

Hufford v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 53 Mich. 118, 18 N. W. 580.

The regulation printed upon the ticket that the conductor only could detach the coupons was a proper regulation.

Mr. George D. Penniman also for appellant.

Mr. Howard Bryant, for appellee:

If a conductor refuses to take tickets offered by a passenger, he must demand the fare, and the passenger must refuse to pay, before the conductor can legally eject the passenger.

McSherry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The single question raised on this record is presented by the prayers for instructions to the jury. These are the facts: The appellee, Dr. Hardesty, lived, with his family, at West Arlington. His wife purchased in her own name what is called a "20-trip coupon book" which entitled the person named and those described therein to ride, subject to certain conditions, on the electric railway of the appellant between West Arlington and Baltimore. The coupon book was issued by the appellant company at a reduced rate. In consideration of the reduced rate, the purchaser agreed to comply with the reasonable regulations of the company. The coupon book declares that "each undetached coupon of this book will entitle Mrs. R. F. Hardesty, a householder, or member of her immediate family, or a servant therein, to ride" over specified lines of the appellant's railway, "between the points and in the direction named in the coupon, and in accordance with the conditions of the contract in back of book." It was further stipulated on the coupons that they would not be "good unless detached by the conductor." On December 24, 1890, Dr. Hardesty and his wife used this coupon ticket in going from West Arlington to Baltimore. After reaching Baltimore the doctor tore out of the book coupons for a return trip from Baltimore to West Arlington, and handed back the book to his wife. Later, on the same day, but not in company with his wife, he boarded a car going to his home. There is a flat conflict in the evidence as to what occurred when the conductor demanded from the appellee his fare; but, as the case is presented on the prayers of the defendant, the version given by the plaintiff and his witnesses must be accepted as correct. According to that version, when the conductor demanded the appellee's fare the latter handed him one of the previously detached coupons, which the conductor received, and then rang up the fare, but immediately said to the appellee, "You will have to show the book." The appellee replied, "I cannot show you the book," and the conductor answered, "You will have to show the book," and the appellee responded, "I cannot show it to you," and thereupon the conductor said, "I will have to put you off the car." The appellee then said, "You can put me off the car, I suppose, but I cannot show you the book." After some conversation with the motorman the conductor returned, and again asked the appellee, "Will you walk off the car?" and the appellee replied, "I won't walk off the car. You will have to put me off." The appellee testified that the conductor "then took hold of me and put me off the car." When the appellee got off the car he waited about fifteen minutes on the sidewalk for the next car, which he took, and upon which he paid his fare. The appellant asked that the case be taken from the jury on the ground that there was no

legally sufficient evidence to entitle the appellee to recover. This request was refused, and the jury returned a verdict for $400, upon which judgment was entered in favor of the appellee, and from that judgment this appeal was taken.

It is clear and indisputable, we think, that the appellee had no right whatever to ride on the detached coupon. It was not an ordinary railway ticket. Under the specific terms of the contract embodied in the ticket, a detached coupon was wholly void. That was a regulation which the company had the power to make, and one to which the purchaser of the ticket expressly agreed. As a token of the holder's right to ride on the car, the detached coupon was of no more value than a slip of blank paper would have been. The holder of the coupon was bound to know this, and he was equally bound to know that the tender of a detached coupon, even if taken up by the conductor, was no more a payment of the car fare than the tender and acceptance of a counterfeit coin would have been. "The ticket," this court has said in speaking of a limited and reduced rate ticket, "is necessarily the conclusive evidence of the nature and extent of the passenger's right." Western Maryland R. Co. v. Stocksedale, 83 Md. 253, 34 Atl. 880. As the detached coupon was void by the very terms of the contract, it was no ticket; and as Dr. Hardesty had, therefore, presented no ticket at all, he obviously had no right to ride on the car unless he paid his fare. The fact that the conductor had rung up the void coupon, as though it had been a valid coupon, did not make it what it was not, and clearly did not give the passenger a right to be transported, when his right to be carried on the car depended altogether on his complying with the rules by paying his fare, and did not depend on the fact that the conductor had rung up the fare, as paid, when it had not in reality been paid. He was not, therefore, entitled to be carried as a passenger. If this be so, the conductor had the right to eject him from the car, unless before doing so he was obliged to demand from the appellee, and be refused, the payment of the fare in cash. This is the pivotal point of the case. On the part of the appellee it is insisted, and the effect of the instruction given in the trial court at the instance of the plaintiff is, that, before the conductor could rightfully expel the plaintiff from the car, he was bound to ask him to pay his fare in cash, and that not until after such a request had been made, and not until after the plaintiff had refused to comply with it, could the conductor eject the passenger. In other words, having once demanded the appellee's fare, and having received a worthless ticket instead of the fare, the conductor was legally bound to make a second demand before removing the passenger from the car. Is that contention legally sound?

When the appellee was told that his detached coupon was worthless unless he exhibited the book from which it had been taken (and this was a fact that the face of the ticket disclosed), why was it any more the duty of the conductor to ask for the fare in cash, than it was the duty of the passenger to voluntarily tender it in cash? The passenger knew that he had no right to ride without paying in some way. It is a matter of common knowledge, of which the court will take judicial notice, and of which the public are bound to take notice, that railroad passenger trains are operated to carry passengers for hire. Condron v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 28 L. R. A. 749, 14 C. C. A. 506, 32 U. S. App. 182, 67 Fed. 522. There were but two ways in which he could pay,—either by ticket or in cash. When he tendered the one, and was informed that it was insufficient because detached, he knew just as well as the conductor knew that his right to remain on the car depended on his doing the only other thing he could do, viz., paying his fare in cash. If he knew this,—and he was bound to know it, and therefore must be held to have known it,—what possible reason can be assigned for holding, as matter of law, that the company, through its conductor, was legally bound to ask the passenger to do precisely what the latter knew he was obliged to do? And how can the failure of the conductor to ask the passenger to pay a fare, which the passenger was well aware he was required to pay if he wished to remain on the car after he had refused to exhibit the book, relieve the passenger from the obligation to voluntarily pay the fare? The right of a carrier of persons to collect fares and to receive them does not depend on the fact that the conductor or other servant demands the fare. The right to collect and receive fare arises out of the circumstance that the passenger enters the conveyance for the purpose of being carried therein. By entering the conveyance for that purpose he agrees to pay the fare, and the duty to pay it is thereby imposed. Morally and legally he is as much bound to pay the fare when not demanded as he is when it is demanded of him, because the duty to pay has not its origin in the demand for payment; and a failure to demand it cannot, consequently, be treated as giving him a right to be transported gratuitously. This being so, the primary and continuing obligation is obviously on the passenger to pay the fare. The demand for it by the carrier is made with a twofold view, viz.: First, for the convenience of the passenger, to save him the annoyance of himself seeking the conductor to deliver the ticket or fare to the latter, and, secondly, for the protection of the company against individuals who would not scruple to ride without paying if they could evade making payment. But neither of these considerations can be converted into or treated as a requirement that when a demand has been once made for a fare, and has not been complied with, or, what is the same thing, has been complied with by the delivery of a worthless ticket, which the holder was bound to know was worthless, the conductor must make a new demand before the passenger can be expelled. None of the cases relied on by the appellee support the cortention, as will be seen in a moment, and it has not been shown that the rules of the company require such a demand to be made.

Whilst the duty to pay the fare does not originate in or rest upon the demand for it, there can be no expulsion of a traveler for not paying until he has refused to pay, and there cannot be a refusal until there has been a demand of some kind. In the case at bar there was a demand; but there was no second demand, and the expulsion of the appellee without making a second demand is the sole basis upon which the case of the appellee must rest. Three cases have been cited by the appellee's counsel. They are Baltimore, C. & A. R. Co. v. Kirby, 88 Md. 409, 41 Atl. 777; Western Maryland R. Co. v. Stocksdale, 83 Md. 252, 34 Atl. 880; and Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Hoefflich, 62 Md. 304, 50 Am. Rep. 223. In the first the plaintiff was riding in an express train on a ticket alleged not to be good on that train, but which was in fact good there. When he presented the ticket the conductor refused to accept it. Afterwards the conductor demanded the ticket, and when the passenger refused to surrender it the conductor demanded the fare, and this the passenger refused to pay, whereupon he was ejected from the train. This court said: "The jury should have been instructed that, although they should find that the conductor had refused the ticket in the front car, yet if he afterwards, and before ejecting the plaintiff, demanded the ticket or the payment of the fare, and that the plaintiff refused both demands, and that thereupon he ejected the plaintiff because he would do nothing, there could be no recovery." In the second case the plaintiff was traveling on an expired limited ticket. The conductor refused to accept it, and demanded the payment of the fare. Upon the plaintiff refusing to pay, he was expelled from the train. We said: "If the plaintiff was not entitled to travel on the ticket so offered by him, and refused to pay the fare when demanded, then his ejection from the train was lawful, and no damages therefor can be recovered in an action of tort." In both cases, as in a great many others that might have been cited, a demand for the payment of the fare in money had actually been made by the conductor, and it was made after he had refused to accept the previously tendered ticket; but in neither case was it held or intimated that such a demand was a necessary prerequisite to the expulsion of the passenger. No such proposition was involved. The language used in the two opinions, and just above quoted, had relation to the facts in evidence; but it does not purport to lay down, as a rule of law, that there was an obligation to make the second demand before ejecting the traveler. The third case was one in which the plaintiff, who had a ticket and had delivered it to the conductor, was accompanied by her sister, a child of eleven years of age, for whom the plaintiff had bought no ticket. When the conductor inquired as to the age of the child, and was informed by the plaintiff, he stated that the plaintiff would be 57 L. R. A.

required to pay half fare for her. This the plaintiff refused to do, and both she and the child were put off the train. That case bears no analogy to this. It was the ordinary case of a refusal to pay a fare when demanded. In nearly all the reported cases,—and they are very numerous indeed,—it will be found that there was in fact a demand by the conductor for the payment of the fare in money after he had refused to accept a worthless or expired ticket; and the decisions, as far as respects the right of recovery, turned, not upon the duty of the conductor to make such a demand before expelling the passenger, but upon the question as to whether the ticket which he had refused to accept was a valid ticket or not, and in no way do they even suggest (much less, determine) that it was necessary for him to make such a demand, or that it was any more obligatory, in law, for him to make a demand of that sort, before ejecting the traveler, than it was incumbent on the passenger to voluntarily tender the fare. The following cases, among others, may be consulted: Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Blocker, 27 Md. 277; McClure v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 34 Md. 532, 6 Am. Rep. 345; Johnson v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 63 Md. 106; Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Rice, 62 Md. xv, 64 Md. 63, 21 Atl. 97; Boylan v. Hot Springs R. Co. 132 U. S. 146, 33 L. ed. 290, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50. And it will be found that the question involved on this appeal was neither suggested on the records, nor did it arise on the facts, and consequently it was not directly or incidentally decided.

A railroad company may eject from its accommodations all persons who refuse compliance with its reasonable regulations. 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1st ed. p. 903. This has been so often announced by the courts that it may be said to have become axiomatic law. A condition printed on a reduced rate ticket to the effect that a coupon affixed thereto shall be invalid unless detached by the conductor is undoubtedly a reasonable regulation. 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1st ed. p. 1090, and cases in notes 2-4. An attempt to use a previously detached coupon, and a refusal to exhibit the book from which it had been taken, clearly forfeit the right of the holder to proceed farther on the car. Hibbard v. New York & E. R. Co. 15 N. Y. 455. If his right to remain on the car is thus forfeited by his own act, it was lawful to eject him, and he could avoid expulsion only by paying or offering to pay his fare. Therefore, if he wished to remain in the car, the duty was on him to tender his fare to the conductor, in the absence of any rule of the company requiring the conductor to demand the fare. There is no evidence that there is such a rule. The case of Texas P. R. Co. v. James, 82 Tex. 306, 15 L. R. A. 347, 18 S. W. 589, throws some light on the question. James boarded a train of the railway. His ticket entitled him to ride to Atlanta. He fell asleep on the train and passed Atlanta. When the conductor went through the train after having passed Atlanta, he asked James if he did not wish to get off at Atlanta, and, having been answered in the affirmative, he stopped the train to put him off. James testified that he told the conductor after looking out of the car window that "we were in Black Bayou bottom, $1\frac{1}{2}$ or 2 miles from Atlanta; . . . that I did not want to get off there. I asked the conductor to let me go on to the next station,"—but the conductor put him off. There was no evidence that the plaintiff offered to pay his fare to the next stopping place, and it nowhere appears in the report of the case that the conductor demanded fare from the plaintiff to the next station. The railroad company asked the court to charge the jury to the effect that it was not the duty of the company to carry the plaintiff to the next station unless he paid or offered to pay his fare to that point, and also that, unless the plaintiff tendered or offered to pay his fare to the next station, the conductor had the right to put him off. The trial court refused to charge the jury in the way thus requested, and on appeal the supreme court of Texas said: "We are of the opinion that this was error. The plaintiff's own neglect led to his being carried beyond his destination. He was not entitled to a free passage to the next station. He could have acquired that right by paying or offering to pay the fare. A formal tender was not necessary, nor even, perhaps, a specific offer to pay. But a mere willingness to pay, unaccompanied by word or act calculated to suggest to the conductor his desire to do so, was not, in our opinion, sufficient to place the conductor in the wrong in ejecting him from the train." The judgment in favor of James was reversed. If, as matter of law, the conductor was bound to demand the fare before expelling the plaintiff, the judgment would have been affirmed. See also Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Wysox, 82 Va. 250; Louisville, N. & G. S. R. Co. v. Harris, 9 Lea, 180, 42 Am. Rep. 668; De Lucas v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. 38 La. Ann. 930.

But we need not prolong this judgment by further citations. If Dr. Hardesty had tendered the fare to the conductor, and had then been expelled, the company would have been answerable. He had ample opportunity to pay the fare, which it was his duty to pay when he declined to show the coupon book. His attempt to ride on a worthless ticket did not impose upon the conductor an obligation to make a second demand for the fare, but did require the holder of the ticket, if he wished to avoid being ejected, to himself make tender of payment. As the plaintiff was in the wrong throughout, he had no cause of action against the company, and the case should have been withdrawn from the jury. The prayer which the appellant presented, and which asked an instruction that the verdict should be for the defendant, ought to have been granted. There was error in rejecting it. Because of that error the judgment must be reversed, and, as upon the plaintiff's own showing, he is not entitled to recover, a new trial will not be awarded.

Judgment reversed, with costs above and below, without awarding a new trial.

COMMISSIONERS OF ANNE ARUNDEL COUNTY.

(94 Md. 321.)

One whose property is cut off from access to markets and from communication with his fellow men by neglect of the county commissioners to keep the highway leading to it in repair suffers a special injury which will entitle him to maintain an action against the commissioners.

(January 16, 1902.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Anne Arundel County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for failure to repair a road and bridge. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James M. Munroe, for appellant:

Where a statute confers powers upon a municipal corporation to be exercised for the public good, the exercise of the power is not discretionary, but imperative, and the words "power and authority" in such case mean "duty and obligation."

Baltimore v. Marriott, 9 Md. 160, 66 Am. Dec. 326; Alleghany County Public School Comrs. v. Alleghany County, 20 Md. 449; Siford v. Morrison, 63 Md. 15; Rock Island County v. United States ex rel. State Bank, 4 Wall. 435, 18 L. ed. 419.

The narr. not only expressly states that the "plaintiff suffers a distinct and peculiar loss, . . . and not a loss in common with the other citizens of the county," etc., but also alleges the specific facts which show that loss, and how it is peculiar and distinct from this common loss of the whole community, leaving the money value of his damage to be assessed by a jury.

Elliott, Roads & Streets, §§ 403, 686, pp. 413, 735; Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. v. Mackenzie, 74 Md. 36, 21 Atl. 690.

The fact that plaintiff may secure a private way under the provisions of art. 25, §§ 100-117. of the Code, in no wise affects his remedy for the injury of which he here complains. Such dereliction of duty by the county commissioners as is alleged in the declaration in this case amounts to a "taking" of private property without compensation.

Leawington*, 3 B. Mon. 25, 38 Am. Dec. 173; Chicago v. Union Bldg. Assn. 102 Ill. 379, 40 Am. Rep. 598.

The courts have recognized a right in the adjoining owner distinct from his rights as a member of the general public, namely, the right of access to his premises, or, as it is called, the "easement of access."

Elliott, Roads & Streets, 2d ed. § 695, p. 749, note 4, § 703, p. 761.

A street once opened and dedicated to public uses by a municipality, especially where abutters have acquired lots and made improvements on the faith that the way will remain a street, cannot be abandoned and closed without compensation for the loss sustained by an abutting owner.

Mr. E. C. Gamtt, for appellees:

If there is a discretionary power vested in the county commissioners to repair or not to repair a bridge on a public highway no action will lie for loss occasioned by such nonrepair.

The powers of the county commissioners are not merely ministerial. In some cases the board is clothed with quasi judicial authority and must exercise judgment and discretion.

Harford County v. Wise, 71 Md. 43, 18 Atl. 31.

The authority of the county commissioners to repair a county road, and the bridge forming part of the same, can only be exercised on the ground that the public convenience requires it. This is the spirit of the law. There is no power vested in the county commissioners to impose the whole public burden on a single person, under pretense of taxing him, nor by like reasoning can they impose by taxation a burden on the whole people for the benefit of one individual.

Talbot County v. Queen Anne County, 50 Md. 259; Baltimore v. Marriott, 9 Md. 160, 66 Am. Dec. 326.

McSherry, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought against the county commissioners of Anne Arundel county to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the appellant in consequence of the nonrepair of a county road and a bridge forming part of that road. The declaration asserts that the bridge ran from the village of Eastport to the land of the plaintiff, and there connected with the public highway running along the shore of the Severn river: that the plaintiff, relying on the premises (that is, the existence of the road and bridge), laid out large sums of money in the purchase and improvement of a considerable tract of land adjoining the highway, which highway, including, as a part, the bridge, was the only means of access that the plaintiff had from his property to markets, mills, churches, and stores, and generally to communicate with his fellow men for the transaction of his lawful business; that the highway was suffered and permitted by the defendant to become utterly impassable, and the bridge was negligently suffered and permitted to become and remain out of repair and broken down so that it cannot be used; that the situation of the land of the plaintiff is peculiar, and different from the situation of the land of other persons residing in the county, inasmuch as the land of other persons there residing is not cut off from access to a public highway as is the land of the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff suffers a distinct and peculiar loss by reason of the action of the defendant, and does not suffer a loss in common with others; he being entirely shut up, and shut out from markets, mills, churches, stores, and generally prevented from communicating with his fellow men for the transaction of his business, and being thus shut up and shut out by reason of the nonrepair of the highway and the bridge. To the declaration, of which the substance has just been stated, the defendant demurred. The circuit court for Anne Arundel county sustained the demurrer, and, judgment being entered thereon for the defendant, the plaintiff took this appeal.

The question is, Do these facts constitute a good cause of action? There has been no formal closing of the highway. Under the Code the method by which the county commissioners may close a public thoroughfare is definitely prescribed; but there is no specific provision made for awarding damages to an abutting proprietor for the injury he may sustain, though, as to the closing of a street in Baltimore city, there is such a provision. Code Pub. Local Laws, art. 4, § 806; Van Witsen v. Gutman, 79 Md. 409, 24 L. R. A. 403, 29 Atl. 608. Whether a public road can be lawfully closed by the county commissioners without compensating individuals who may be injuriously affected by the discontinuance of the highway is a question not now involved, and therefore not calling for a decision. Nor is this action at all akin to those wherein attempts have been made, but unsuccessfully made, to hold municipal authorities answerable in damages for injuries inflicted by a change in the grade of a street or highway; and consequently with the principles applicable to that distinct class of cases we have no concern in this. The pending suit is founded on the alleged total obstruction of a public road, including, as a part thereof, a public bridge. Had the obstructions which are alleged to consist in a condition of negligent disrepair caused an injury to the person of the plaintiff whilst attempting with due care to use the road, there could be no doubt of his right to maintain an action therefor, and to recover compensation for the injury. And so, too, had his horse or his carriage or other vehicle been in like manner injured, he could sustain a suit against the defendant. The books are full of adjudged cases on these subjects. The cases are familiar, and have been of frequent occurrence, and there is no need to pause for the purpose of alluding to them. The ground upon which such actions are supported is the negligence of the defendant in failing to keep the road or bridge in proper repair. The duty being upon the county to keep its roads and bridges in a safe condition for use by the public, and the county authorities having at their command the means and the money with which to maintain its roads and bridges in a condition of safety, the failure to perform the duty is actionable negligence, if injury results therefrom to one lawfully and with due care using the road or bridge. But the acts complained of in the declaration now under examination do not bring this case within the principle just announced, because this is not a suit for a personal injury or for an injury to personal property sustained whilst in actual use of the road, but it is a suit by an abutting proprietor for the maintenance of a public nuisance by the defendant, whereby the plaintiff was injured, not merely in being deprived of the ability to use the road at all, but in being deprived of access to and egress from his property. It is true that mere deprivation of the use of a highway because of its defective condition will furnish no ground of action. 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 463. But here the averment goes further, and alleges that the plaintiff has been shut in from the outside world by reason of the nonrepair of the highway.

Ordinarily and generally the remedy applicable to a public nuisance is by indictment, though a private action will lie at the suit of an individual who has sustained a special damage differing, not in degree, but in kind, from that to which the community has been subjected. Crook v. Pitcher, 61 Md. 510; Caritee v. Baltimore, 53 Md. 422; Houck v. Wachter, 34 Md. 265, 6 Am. Rep. 332. And the question is, Does this case, under the averments of the declaration, fall within this doctrine? We do not recall at the moment any precisely similar case in our own Reports; but the principles which ought to control the solution of the question are perfectly clear, and there can be no serious difficulty in their application to the facts as admitted by the demurrer. The case of Houck v. Wachter, 34 Md. 265, 6 Am. Rep. 332, will throw some light on the controversy now before us. That was a suit between two individuals. Wachter sued Houck to recover damages for the obstruction of a highway. The special damage alleged was that, by reason of the obstruction which Houck had erected, Wachter was obliged to go from his farm to his market town, to mills, and to the courthouse by a very circuitous route; and the question was whether that was such special damage as would support the action,—was it different in kind from the damage inflicted upon every other person who used the same public road? In 57 L. R. A.

the course of the judgment delivered by this court, it was said: "All the authorities agree that, to support the action, the damage must be different, not merely in degree, but different in kind, from that suffered in common; hence it has been well settled that though the plaintiff may suffer more inconvenience than others from the obstruction, by reason of his proximity to the highway, that will not entitle him to maintain the action." Proceeding, the court further said: "The special damage alleged is that having gone to Frederick City by the highway in question, as he was returning home, he met the obstruction, was withheld by the defendant from removing it, and in consequence was 'obliged to proceed to his farm by a very circuitous route.'" To show that such a damage was not special, and not sufficient to sustain the action, the court further said: "It is not averred that the highway which was obstructed was the only way to and from his farm, or that it was necessary to enable him to pass and repass from his farm to mills, market, etc. The averment is that it was the most direct and convenient route." A recovery was denied to Wachter because the damage of which he complained was of the same kind as that which other persons using the highway sustained by reason of the obstruction placed there by Houck. It would seem, from the line of reasoning pursued, that, if Wachter had had no other highway over which he could have passed from his farm to markets and other public places, he could have maintained the action, because in that event the damage caused him would have been wholly different in kind from that sustained by the public generally. This conclusion is fortified by the decision in Gore v. Brubaker, 55 Md. 87. That was an application by Gore for an injunction to restrain Brubaker from erecting obstructions on a strip of land alleged to be a public way contiguous to Gore's lot in the village of Uniontown, Carroll county. It was insisted that the obstructions, if erected, would deprive Gore of reasonable access to his buildings on his lot, and would thereby subject him to loss and damage. This court said: "If the allegations of the bill were true, and the plaintiff had done nothing to preclude him from invoking the aid of the court, there could be but little difficulty in affording him relief. For if, by reason of the obstructions complained of, in the public way or alley, the plaintiff had been obstructed or deprived of reasonable access to his buildings on his lot, and thereby subjected to loss and inconvenience, that would be such special and particular injury to the plaintiff as would entitle him to remedy from a court of equity. Roman v. Strauss, 10 Md. 89; Georgetown v. Alexandria Canal Co. 12 Pet. 98, 9 L. ed. 1015; Irwin v. Dixon, 9 How. 10, 13 L. ed. 25; Cook v. Bath, L. R. 6 Eq. 177; Higbee v. Camden & A. R. Co. 19 N. J. Eq. 278."

If an individual had caused the obstruction of the highway mentioned in the declaration now before us, he would assuredly be answerable in an action at the instance of the plaintiff if the facts relied on in the narr. were shown to be true; and there is no reason why the county commissioners should not be liable, under the same state of facts, if the obstruction has resulted from their negligent or persistent refusal to make the highway fit for travel. The fact that the county commissioners have caused or are responsible for the continuance of the nuisance can be no reason for defeating the action, if it be otherwise maintainable; for public officials or municipal corporations have no more right to create or maintain a public nuisance than a private individual has. Harford County v. Wise, 71 Md. 52, 18 Atl. 31. And the liability of the one in such an instance is similar to that of the other. Baltimore v. Brannan, 14 Md. 227. Inasmuch, then, as the declaration distinctly alleges that the highway with the bridge in question was the only means by which the appellant had access to and egress from his farm and buildings, it shows on its face a special and particular injury inflicted on the plaintiff by reason of the nonrepair of the thoroughfare;

and it shows an injury differing in kind from that which other members of the community can suffer from the same cause. Of course, if the appellant (the plaintiff below) has any other way or road by which he can get to and from his premises, he cannot maintain this action, even though he is put to more inconvenience, or is required to travel a much greater distance, in using the other highway. As we are dealing exclusively with the case made by the declaration, we must confine our discussion to its legal sufficiency; and upon the case there stated we are of opinion, for the reasons we have assigned, that a good cause of action has been set forth. There was consequently error in sustaining the demurrer of the defendant, and the judgment entered in its favor must be reversed, and the record will be remanded so that pleas may be filed, and the cause may be brought to trial on its merits.

v.

City of LACONIA.

(.....N. H.)

Damages for injury to a property by discontinuing a portion of the street on which it is situated, so that traffic is diverted from it, trade diminished, and its value lessened, although access to it still exists by a longer route, cannot be recovered under a statute providing for the payment of damages sustained by the discontinuance of a highway.

(September 6, 1901.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Belknap County Court made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's business which were alleged to have resulted from the closing of a portion of a highway. Sustained.

Plaintiff had a place of business located on Gold street, at which he received much custom from persons living north of Gold street, who came from Union avenue across the railroad tracks. Defendant discontinued the portion of Gold street from Union avenue to the west side of the railroad tracks, thereby requiring plaintiff's customers to go to Elm street and then back to Gold street to reach plaintiff's store. Plaintiff claimed that the result of this was that the customers in reaching plaintiff's store were compelled to pass other stores where goods similar to those sold by plaintiff were on sale, and that they made their purchases at those stores rather than make the extra journey to plaintiff's store, so that his trade fell off, and his property was rendered less desirable for business purposes and was reduced in value by reason of the discontinuance of the portion of the street.

NOTE.—As to liability of county commissioners for neglecting to repair road, by which access to property is cut off, see the preceding case of Bembe v. Anne Arundel County.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Stephen S. Jewett, for defendant: The legislature has power to vacate a street or highway, and this power it may delegate to municipal authorities.

Elliott, Roads & Streets, 661.

It is not necessary to award damages to persons whose land does not abut on the discontinued portion of a street or highway in order to make the proceedings valid.

Thompson v. Major, 58 N. H. 244.

In discontinuing a street, injury to the goodwill of the business of this plaintiff, or to any lessee under him, could not be considered on the question of damages.

Edmands v. Boston, 108 Mass. 535.

It could not have been the intention of the legislature to give damages upon discontinuance to any individual for inconveniences experienced by him in common with all the rest of the community.

The discontinuance of a part of a street in a city, by order of the mayor and aldermen, whereby the value of lands abutting on other parts of the street and on neighboring streets is lessened, is not a ground of action against the city by the owner of such lands, if still accessible by other public streets.

Messrs. Stone & Shannon, for plaintiff: The statute is certainly broad enough to include persons whose land does not abut upon the highway.

Concord's Petition, 50 N. H. 530.

If owners of land abutting upon a discontinued highway are entitled to damages, why should not the owners of land abutting upon that portion of the highway not discontinued but near to the discontinued portion be entitled to damages which have resulted as a direct and immediate consequence of such discontinuance.

Natick Gaslight Co. v. Natick, 175 Mass. 250, 56 N. E. 292; Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. 254.

Remick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Highways are established, altered, and discontinued for the public good. Underwood v. Bailey, 56 N. H. 187, 59 N. H. 480. It must be presumed that the public good required the discontinuance in question. Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. 254, 256. Public good involves, almost invariably, individual and sectional injury. In the make-up of society, there are such diverse and conflicting interests that it is impossible to so regulate governmental action as to confer universal benefit. The general welfare is all that is attainable. To secure this is the chief object of government, and to submit to it, however injurious, with or without compensation, according to circumstances, is the primary obligation of citizenship. For general injuries, or those which result indirectly from the mere operation of a public improvement, the law allows the citizen no compensation. These are part of the price he pays for the protection and privileges of government. It is only when the act of the public inflicts upon him some special, peculiar, and direct injury that he is entitled to damage. The principle underlying these observations is elementary, is not disputed, and controls the present case. If the plaintiff's damages are special, peculiar, and direct, he has a right of action to recover them. If general and indirect, the law affords him no remedy. The rule sounds simple enough, and is easily stated. The difficulty lies in its application,—in determining whether the plaintiff's damages are general or special. This is the sole question in the present case. To the solution of this question, the statute under which the petition is brought lends no aid. It simply provides that "the damages sustained . . . by the discontinuance of a highway . . . may be assessed," etc. Pub. Stat. chap. 72, § 4. Taken literally, the statute is broad enough to allow damages for all injuries, whether special or general. But it has been limited by construction, in accordance with the principle already stated. In Concord's Petition, 50 N. H. 530, the court held: "It could not have been the intention of the legislature to give damages, upon a discontinuance, to any individual for inconveniences experienced by him in common with all the rest of the community. If the inconveniences suffered . . .

differ only in degree, and not in kind, from those endured by the public generally, he cannot recover damages therefor. 'But if he suffers a peculiar and special damage, not common to the public,' and that damage is the direct consequence of the discontinuance, he may recover therefor under the statute." This construction was approved and followed in Candia v. Chandler, 58 N. H. 127-129, where the court again declared that only peculiar and special damages are recoverable under the statute. As a result of the construction placed upon it by these cases, the statute must be viewed as if it read: "Damages which are not common to the public, but are peculiar and special, and the direct result of the discontinuance, may be assessed," etc. While Concord's Petition and Candia v. Chandler thus serve to limit the general terms of the statute, and bring us back to the general principle stated at the outset, viz., that only special, peculiar, and direct damages are recoverable, they furnish no clear and definite rule by which to determine whether damages in a given case are general and consequential, or peculiar, special, and direct, and whether the plaintiff's injuries fall within the one class or the other. The almost stereotyped statement to be found in the cases, that for damages differing only in degree, and not in kind, from those endured by the public at large, there can be no recovery, while for peculiar and special damages, not common to the public, recovery may be had, is so general and indefinite that, without the aid of the cases applying, defining, and limiting it, it is, at best, a most perplexing guide, as is evidenced by its fruitfulness as a source of contention, and by the difficulty which courts have encountered in its application, — a difficulty they have often testified to (Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. 254; Davis v. Hampshire County, 153 Mass. 218, 223, 11 L. R. A. 750, 26 N. E. 848; Chicago v. Burcky, 158 Ill. 103, 29 L. R. A. 568, 42 N. E. 178; Heller v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 28 Kan. 625), and doubtless more often experienced.

No case has come to our attention in this jurisdiction where the court has made application of the rule to a claim for damages arising from a discontinuance of a highway. In Concord's Petition, 50 N. H. 530, the rule was stated, but the court expressly declined to make any application of it in the then stage of the case. So in Candia v. Chandler, 58 N. H. 127, there was a restatement of the rule, but no application of it to the specific facts. In neither case did the court undertake to decide whether the damages alleged were special or general, direct or consequential, recoverable or nonrecoverable. But while there has been in this jurisdiction no direct application of the rule in any case for damage arising from the discontinuance of a highway, there are cases in our Reports relating to the laying out of highways where the court has differentiated general and consequential from special and direct damages in a way to throw light upon the subject, and aid solution of the question before us. 57 L. R. A.

In Re Mt. Washington Road Co. 35 N. H. 134, damage was claimed, not only for injury done to the plaintiff's land by taking a portion of it for a highway to the summit of Mt. Washington, but also for injury to his livery business and property by diversion of travel from the plaintiff's bridle path. The court, by Perley, Ch. J., said: For damages "not caused by the taking of the land for the road, but by the change which the public improvement introduces into the course of business, . . . the public is not bound to make compensation. . . . The damages awarded to the landowner are limited to the direct injury done to the land. . . . If . . . the public improvement, by causing a change in the course of business, . . . should occasion a loss, . . . he must bear that loss in common with others who are in a like situation. The circumstance that the public may require some interest in his private property to accomplish the public object gives him no claim to indemnification for a loss not in any way caused by the taking of his property, but by the operation of the public improvement." These observations seem peculiarly applicable to the present case. Here, as there, the damage claimed is not for the taking of the plaintiff's land, or any direct invasion of his property, but, as distinctly appears from the case, for loss of business and depreciation of property resulting from a diversion of travel occasioned by a legitimate public improvement.

We are also helped to a correct understanding and application of the rule by the cases in this jurisdiction relating to the set-off of benefits where land was taken for highway purposes. The general rule on this subject is the same as the rule in respect to the allowance of damages, viz., that only special and peculiar benefits can be taken into consideration. Applying this rule, it has been repeatedly held in this state that benefits from improved facilities of communication, favorable diversion of travel, increased trade, and appreciation of property, resulting from the establishment of a new highway, cannot be set off against damages, because they are general and not special benefits. Carpenter v. Landaff, 42 N. H. 218; Whitcher v. Benton, 50 N. H. 25; Adden v. White Mountains N. H. R. Co. 55 N. H. 413, 419, 20 Am. Rep. 220; Woodman v. Northwood, 67 N. H. 307, 36 Atl. 255. If favorable diversion of travel, and consequent increase of trade and appreciation of property, resulting from the opening of a highway, are general benefits, why are not unfavorable diversion of travel, and consequent decrease of trade and depreciation of property, resulting from the discontinuance of a highway, general damages?

Following these analogies drawn from our own Reports, without other guidance, we should be brought to a conclusion adverse to the plaintiff. But the precise question here presented has been frequently before courts of highest authority in other jurisdictions, with like result. A case more frequently cited than any other is Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. 254. Like the case at bar, it was a petition, under a statute essentially like our own, for the assessment of damages occasioned to the plaintiff's property by the discontinuance of a portion of a certain street in the city of Boston. As in the case at bar, no part of the property in question abutted upon that portion of the street which was discontinued, and the property was still accessible by other public streets. The conclusion of the court is well stated in the syllabus, as follows: "The discontinuance of part of a street in a city [by order of the mayor and aldermen], whereby the value of land abutting on other parts of the street is lessened, is not a ground of action against the city by the owner of such lands, if the same are still accessible by other public streets." Davis v. Hampshire County, 153 Mass. 218, 11 L. R. A. 750, 26 N. E. 848, is also strongly in point. South street, in Northampton, was crossed by a certain railroad. The portion of the street occupied by the crossing was discontinued. Before the discontinuance, the street was a thoroughfare, with numerous intersecting streets. By the discontinuance, travel along the street from both directions was interrupted at the crossing. The petitioners' premises abutted upon the street, but at a point some distance from the part discontinued. The complaint was that the discontinuance cut off the direct route from the petitioners' premises to the principal business streets of Northampton, and made it necessary to resort to a circuitous route over other streets, to the serious and permanent injury of the plaintiffs' property. Certainly these facts present as good ground for relief as those in the case at bar, but the court said: "We are of opinion that the petitioners would not be entitled to recover damages for the diminished value of their lands; that being a loss not peculiar to themselves, but the same in kind as that which is suffered by others who owned lands situated upon the same street. . . . Although the doctrine may sometimes be rather harsh in its application to special cases, there are sound reasons on which it rests. The chief of these reasons are that to hold otherwise would be to encourage many trivial suits. that it would discourage public improvements if a whole neighborhood were to be allowed to recover damages for such injuries to their estates, and that the loss is of a kind which purchasers of land must be held to have contemplated as liable to occur, and to have made allowance for in the price which they paid." Other Massachusetts cases to the same effect might be reviewed, but it is sufficient to say that the doctrine announced by Chief Justice Shaw in Smith v. Boston has been steadfastly adhered to in that jurisdiction, after the fullest re-examination. The doctrine of that case has nowhere found abler exposition than in Heller v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 28 Kan. 625. In that case the petitioner had bought land on an established street, and erected buildings which were occupied for business purposes. At the time of the purchase there was more travel on that street than on any other street in that part of the city. Action was taken to discontinue a portion of the street, away from the plaintiff's property; and it was complained that the discontinuance would divert a large and increasing amount of travel from the plaintiff's property, and render it of no value for business purposes, and of small value for residence purposes. While the matter came up on a petition for injunction, the question in the present case was directly involved and fully considered. The following quotation from the opinion of Judge Brewer is peculiarly applicable: "Where a party owns a lot which abuts on that portion of the street vacated, so that access to the lot is shut off, it is clear that the lotowner is directly injured. . . . The closing up of access to the lot is the direct result of the vacating of the street, and he, by the loss of access to his lot, suffers an injury which is not common to the public; but in the case at bar access to the plaintiff's lots is in no manner interfered with. The full width of the street in front and on the side [of the lots] is free and undisturbed, and the only real complaint is that by the vacating of the street away from her lots the course of travel is changed. But this is only an indirect result. There is nothing to prevent travel coming by her lots if the travelers desire it. The way to the heart of the city by her lots is a little more remote than it was before, but still free passage is open to all who wish to pass thereby. No one is compelled to stay away. Access to the lots is the same that it was before, so that the injury is only the indirect result of the action complained of, and it is an injury which, if it exists at all, is sustained by all other lots along the street west of the parts vacated. Travel by those lots may be diminished, travel on streets south may be increased, and to that extent property on such southern streets may be benefited thereby. The same result would follow if some other avenue of approach to the city were specially improved. . . . But surely that thus the tendency of travel in front of her lots was diverted would give her no cause of action. The benefits which come and go from the changing currents of travel are not matters in respect to which any individual has any vested right, against the judgment of the public authorities." Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. 254, and Concord's Petition, 50 N. H. 530, were cited in support of the foregoing views. Another case in point, and especially instructive, is Dantzer v. Indianapolis Union R. Co. 141 Ind. 604, 34 L. R. A. 769, 39 N. E. 223. In that case the court says, in substance, that, in addition to property in the soil of his lots, the abutter has a property right in the street,—that is to say, the appendant right of access, or easement of access, in front of his lots,—and that he should be allowed such damages as he suffers from obstruction of such right of access. "We think we may safely assert, however, that the obstruction of the easement of access need not always be upon the immediate front of the lot whose owner is affected, but that if the obstruction, though remote, renders access to such lot impossible, or impairs it in a substantial manner, at the point where it abuts upon the street, the property right of the lotowner is invaded, and he may recover. To illustrate this proposition, if a street were fully obstructed on either side of one's lot, so that the lines of the lot could not be reached, access would be denied to the lotowner, though the street in front of his lot had upon it no obstructions. The property rights of the lotowner, as against the public, are coterminous with the lines of his lot, but that property right might be obstructed and its uses defeated by cutting off ingress and egress to and from such lines. . . . In such case there should be, and is, a remedy. . . . There can be no doubt, however, that the overwhelming weight of authority . . . is in favor of confining the award for such damages to those who are deprived, in whole or in part, of access to that section of the highway immediately abutting upon or in front of their own real estate." It was considered that depreciation in the value of property by the added inconvenience of access thereto, consequent on the vacation of a street at a point some distance therefrom, was an injury not different in kind, but only in degree, from that suffered by the community in general, and would not sustain a right of action for damages. Coster v. Albany, 43 N. Y. 399, was where a public bridge was removed, by reason of which it was made necessary, in order to reach the store of the plaintiff, to go over another bridge, at a much greater distance. It was held that no action could be maintained. The court said: "No part of the bridge was on the property of the plaintiffs. They had no interest or right in it as property. There is left to the plaintiffs an approach to their property by the State street bridge, though less near, less easy, less commodious. The damage to the plaintiffs' property from this cause is entirely indirect and remote." In Buhl v. Ft. Street Union Depot Co. 98 Mich. 596, 604, 23 L. R. A. 392, 395, 57 N. W. 829, 832, the court says: "A distinction may well be held to exist between the injury which results to an abutting owner, or another so situated that the means of ingress and egress to and from the premises are cut off by the discontinuance of a street, and one owning land upon another street, or on the same street at a distance from the part of the highway discontinued." It is further said, in effect, that the inconvenience caused to an abutting owner on a street by discontinuing another portion of the street, making travel to and from his premises less direct, is damnum absque injuria, being the same in kind that all the property suffers, and cannot be regarded as damages within the provisions of a statute providing for the payment of all damages consequent on the closing of streets. In State, Kean, Prosecutrix, v. Elizabeth, 54 N. J. L. 462, 24 Atl. 495, it was held that "a person owning lands upon a part of a street not vacated is not deprived of any vested rights in property for which she is entitled to compensation by reason of said vacation."

In addition to the foregoing authorities to which special attention has been called, and to the same general effect, are Castle v. Berkshire County, 11 Gray, 26; Hammond v. Worcester County, 154 Mass. 509, 28 N. E. 902; Stanwood v. Malden, 157 Mass. 17, 16 L. R. A. 591, 31 N. E. 702; Nichols v. Richmond, 162 Mass. 170, 38 N. E. 501; Clark v. Providence, 10 R. W. 743; Whitsett v. Union Depot & R. Co. 10 Colo. 243, 15 Pac. 339; Polack v. San Francisco Orphan Asylum, 48 Cal. 490.

Eminent text writers of highest authority have accepted, in one form or another, the view taken by these cases. In the text to Elliott, Roads & Streets, at page 663, the rule is thus stated: "Owners of land abutting upon neighboring streets, or upon other parts of the same street, are not, however, entitled to damages, notwithstanding the value of the lands may be lessened by its vacation or discontinuance." And in a note on page 664 the same author says: "We suppose that there is a right to compensation only where the easement of access is directly impaired." See also 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 666. But our attention has been called to several carefully considered cases, which would seem, in their reasoning and application, broad enough, if followed in this jurisdiction, to warrant a recovery in the present case. Re Melon Street, 182 Pa. 307, 38 L. R. A. 275, 38 Atl. 482; Chicago v. Burcky, 158 Ill. 103, 29 L. R. A. 568, 42 N. E. 178; Chicago v. Baker, 30 C. C. A. 364, 58 U. S. App. 569, 86 Fed. 753, 39 C. C. A. 318, 98 Fed. 830. In Re Melon Street, it appears that Melon street was a cross street connecting Ninth and Tenth streets, in the city of Philadelphia. The parts of Ninth and Melon streets at their junction were discontinued. The property damaged was on Melon street, but not on the part discontinued. Melon street, in front of the complainant's property, remained as before; and the complainant could still go to and from all parts of the city by way of the remaining portion of Melon street and Tenth street, but was compelled to go further to reach points to the eastward. In the superior court recovery was denied, but not without a vigorous dissenting opinion, which on appeal was approved and accepted. In both courts the question was exhaustively considered, and, whatever view may be taken as to the correctness of the conclusions finally reached, it must be admitted that the case constitutes an important contribution to the legal discussion of the subject. Briefly stated, the conclusions of the court on appeal, in substance, were: That an abutter has a vested right, for the purpose of access to his property, not only to that portion of the street upon which his premises abut, with communication therefrom to the general system of streets, but also to the continuation of the remainder of the street, with all its connections, to the point where their continuance ceases to be of proximate and calculable advantage to his access, and becomes of only remote and incalculable advantage, and that it is for the jury to determine when this point is reached, and to give or deny damages accordingly. The court also held that while the discontinuance of a street anywhere within the limits suggested, impairing the means of ingress and egress, constitutes a peculiar and special injury, for which an action can be maintained, yet, in estimating damages, no account can be taken of the depreciation of the property in consequence of the diversion of travel, nor of the inconvenience to which the property owner is subjected, in having to go by a more circuitous route in some cases; these being regarded as general damages, differing only in degree, and not in kind, from those suffered by the public at large. Chicago v. Burcky and Chicago v. Baker give qualified support to the doctrine of Re Melon Street, so far as concerns the scope of the abutter's vested right, and unqualified support to the doctrine of that case as to the exclusion of inconvenience and diversion of travel as elements of damage. It is to be noted that, according to these decisions,—the most favorable to the plaintiff to be found anywhere,—he can recover nothing for depreciation of property resulting from diversion of travel, loss of trade, and inconvenience. As these, manifestly, are the elements of damage upon which the plaintiff's claim and the jury's award were based, there is but little left for the plaintiff, in any event. But Re Melon Street, as favorable to the plaintiff, does not commend itself to our judgment. The doctrine that the abutter is entitled to damages arising from discontinuance of any part of the street, interfering in any degree with any means of access, to his property, with no limit but the rule of remoteness, and this although the street in front of the abutter remains undisturbed, and he still has communication therefrom with the general system of streets, strikes us as unsound in principle, difficult of application, and opposed to the great weight of authority. To test the principle, suppose a street is 5 miles long; that at one end is the plaintiff's residence, and at the other is his place of business; that halfway between a short section of the street is discontinued, compelling the plaintiff at that point to make a circuit of a mile before coming back into the street again, and increasing by about that much the distance to be traveled in going and coming. Here is a substantial interference with the means of access to both his place of business and his residence, in the broadest sense of the term, and substantial damage as well; yet all would admit that it is not such a discontinuance and not such an interference with the right of access as would entitle him to compensation. Bring the discontinuance and its enforced circuit within a mile, and yet closer,—within a half or a quarter of a mile, or even within 50 rods,—of the complainant's property, and everybody would still agree that it was not such an interference with the right of access as to afford ground for recovery. At what point, then, is the province of the jury to attach? When it attaches, by what rule are they to determine when impairment of access is proximate, and when it is not? Shall it be by rule of distance, or one depending upon the degree of impairment? Reflections like these satisfy us of the impracticability and practical impossibility of upholding the doctrine of Re Melon Street, and at the same time preserving anything like intelligent and systematic administration of justice with respect to this class of claims. And when to the difficulty and confusion from this source are added the confusion and difficulty which would inevitably follow from requiring the jury to so draw the line as to exclude damages from diversion of travel and inconvenience, and, finally, when we consider the multiplicity of suits of every degree of remoteness to which the public would be subjected by such a rule, in itself "an intolerable evil" (Shaw v. Boston & A. R. Co. 159 Mass. 597, 35 N. E. 92; Quincy Canal v. Newcomb, 7 Met. 276, 39 Am. Dec. 778),—we are convinced that the legislature did not intend to so enlarge the abutter's rights. The sounder and better doctrine, in every way, is that declared in Smith v. Boston, and the long line of cases following it, to which we have called attention, viz., that a discontinuance which leaves undisturbed the highway in front of the abutter's premises, and leaves him connection therefrom with the general system of streets, is not a destruction or impairment of any vested right, and furnishes no cause of action for damages. Concord's Petition, 50 N. H. 530, and Candia v. Chandler, 58 N. H. 127, when correctly understood, are in harmony with this latter view. To be sure, in Concord's Petition, the court says that the statute is "broad enough to include persons whose lines do not abut on the highway." But this language must be understood in the qualified sense in which the same view is expressed in Smith v. Boston, where the court says: "We do not mean to be understood as laying down a universal rule, that in no case can a man have damages for the discontinuance of a highway unless his land bounds upon it, although, as applicable to city streets, intersecting each other at short distances, it is an equitable rule. A man may have a farm, store, mill, or wharf, not bounding on a street, but communicating with it by a private way, so situated that he has no access to his property but by the public way. If this is discontinued, he must lose the benefit of his estate, or open a way at his own expense, which might be a direct and tangible damage consequent upon the discontinuance of the public way; and we are not prepared to say that he would not have a claim for damages under the statute." And in Dantzer v. Indianapolis Union R. Co. 141 Ind. 604, 34 L. R. A. 769, 39 N. E. 223, where the court says: "We think we may safely assert, however, that the obstruction of the easement of access need not always be upon the immediate front of the lot whose owner is affected, but that if the obstruction, though remote, renders access to such lot impossible, or impairs it in a substantial manner at the point where it abuts upon the street, the property right of the lotowner is invaded, and he may recover." Undoubtedly the discontinuance of any part of the street, although away from the complainant's premises, which has the effect to destroy or impair the portion of the street upon which he abuts as a means of access, by cutting it off from communication with the system of streets, would be actionable,—not, however, because of the discontinuance of the street away from the plaintiff's premises, but because of the practical discontinuance of the part upon which he abuts, as an effect of the actual discontinuance of the part away. This involves no qualification or extension of the rule, but is merely upholding it in its integrity. That the language of the court in Concord's Petition was used in the limited sense expressed in Smith v. Boston appears probable from the fact that the circumstances in Concord's Petition brought the latter case squarely within the possible exception suggested and illustrated by Chief Justice Shaw, whose opinion in Smith v. Boston was evidently made the basis of the decision in Concord's Petition. And this probability finds confirmation in the qualified language employed by the court in Concord's Petition where they say: "All that the court now decide is that the commissioners were mistaken in supposing that in no possible event could they legally award damages to a man whose land 'did not come to the road.'" What the court says elsewhere in the opinion, excluding general, and limiting recovery to peculiar, special, and direct, damages, taking these terms in the sense in which they are employed in Smith v. Boston and other cases to the same effect, is inconsistent with an intention to allow general, indirect, and consequential damages, such as were allowed in the Melon Street Case, and cases following, and such as are claimed in the present case. What the court says in Candia v. Chandler, viz., that "the effect of the statute is to give to certain landowners vested rights in the continuation of a highway that has been laid out, that cannot be taken from them by a discontinuance of it, except upon the payment of such damages as are occasioned them thereby," must also be understood in the limited sense expressed in Smith v. Boston and Dantzer v. Indianapolis Union R. Co. 57 L. R. A.

This review of the authorities establishes that they are practically unanimous upon the following points: (1) That the right of recovery for damages from discontinuance of a highway is limited to such damages as are peculiar and special to the claimant; (2) that damages resulting from diversion of travel, and inconvenience from having to go by a more circuitous route, are not special, but general, damages, and not recoverable; (3) that the abutter has a certain vested right in the highway upon which he is located, as a means of access to his property, for the destruction or impairment of which he has a cause of action; and (4) that special damages are those only which destroy or impair this vested right. To this extent there would seem to be practical agreement. The conflict comes upon the question of the scope of this vested right, and upon this controverted point Smith v. Boston and the long line of cases to the same effect declare what is, believed to be the correct general principle, and the one most in accord with the analogies furnished by our own decisions, and with the overwhelming weight of authority. There are no special facts in this case to distinguish it. The street in front of the plaintiff's premises remains intact, and from this portion of the street the plaintiff still has free communication with the entire system of highways. The only complaint is that the distance required to be traveled to reach his property, in some directions, has been increased, and that travel in front of his premises has been thereby diverted, trade diminished, and the value of his property lessened. These facts bring the case squarely within the principle of the authorities. If the result is a hardship to the plaintiff, it is a hardship which is suffered by all of the numerous owners upon the portion of Gold street not discontinued. This fact alone has been held sufficient to make the plaintiff's damages "general," in the sense which excludes recovery. Dantzer v. Indianapolis Union R. Co. 141 Ind. 604, 34 L. R. A. 769, 39 N. E. 223; Heller v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 28 Kan. 625; Davis v. Hampshire County, 153 Mass. 218, 11 L. R. A. 750, 26 N. E. 848. Furthermore, the hardship is in measure only, and slight measure at that, different from the hardship to which the plaintiff would be subjected were we to follow the cases most favorable to him, since even these deny to him compensation for depreciation of property from inconvenience and diversion of travel. Chicago v. Baker, 30 C. C. A. 364, 58 U. S. App. 569, 86 Fed. 753, 39 C. C. A. 318, 98 Fed. 830; Chicago v. Spoor, 190 Ill. 340, 60 N. E. 540; Re Melon Street, 182 Pa. 307, 38 L. R. A. 275, 38 Atl. 482. At most, it is a hardship resulting from the mere operation of a public improvement, involving no taking of property and no interference with vested rights. As such, it falls within that class of general injuries, referred to at the outset, to which the few are ever being subjected for the good of the many, and for which the law allows no compensation but the privileges and protection of government, including the protection which the plaintiff, as a member of the public, has had in the past, and will hereafter have, from claims of a like character.

Exception sustained, verdict set aside, and judgment for the defendants.

OLIVER DITSON COMPANY

v.

William H. BATES.

(.....Mass.....)

1. In an action, by one claiming title, for possession of property which defendant had purchased from a third person, a lease from plaintiff to such third person is admissible in evidence to show the nature of such person's right to possession of the property, and to rebut any presumption of agency on his part to sell it.
2. In the absence of any evidence of authority on the part of the lessee of a piano to sell the same in an action by the lessor to recover possession of it from one who purchased it from the lessee, the jury cannot be permitted to consider the question of such authority.
3. The fact that lessees of a piano have a retail store at which musical instruments are kept for sale, which is well known to the lessor, gives the lessees no right to sell the instrument.
4. No estoppel upon the owner of a piano who leases it to a retail dealer in musical instruments to claim it from one who purchased it from the dealer arises from the facts that the lease provided that it should be kept in the purchaser's house, and that the lessor failed to notify the purchaser of his claim to the instrument for a period of nearly two years, during which time the purchaser bought and paid for it believing it to belong to the lessee.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action brought to recover for the conversion of a piano which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Overruled.

J. Q. Beale conducted, at Rockland, Massachusetts, the business of a retail dealer in musical instruments under the name of J. Q. Beale & Son. Defendant, who had had dealings with Mr. Beale before, applied to him for a piano for use in his summer home at Marshfield. Beale said that he had not one, but would have one in a few days. Subsequently he told defendant that the piano would come to him from Boston. The piano was subsequently delivered in a case, having the name Oliver Ditson Company stamped on it. The piano was made by Jacobs, and had been purchased by plaintiff some time previous. It appeared that Beale procured the piano from plaintiff under the following lease:

Boston, July 9, 1895.

I have this day Hired and Received of Oliver Ditson Company, One Piano Made by Jacobs, No. 11,088, for which I hereby agree to pay the sum of $16 per quarter, and cartage or transportation . . . way . . . , said cartage amounting to. . . . This includes boxing.

Said piano to be located at No. [William H. Bates] Street, Brandt Rock, Town or City, Marshfield, Mass., and not to be removed therefrom without the consent in writing of Messrs. Oliver Ditson Company.

I promise to return said Piano in as good a condition as when received (reasonable wear and tear excepted) on demand. If not returned at the end of the first quarter, it is to be considered as held for any additional time until notice of ending this contract is given at a pro rata charge for quarterly rent.

And it is further agreed that the said Oliver Ditson Company, or their Agents, may at any time enter any dwelling or building where said property is situated, and examine the same, and if all the conditions or agreements on this instrument are not complied with, take possession of and remove said property, without being deemed guilty of any trespass in any manner whatever, or liable for any damages arising from said entry and taking.

Signature, J. Q. Beale & Son, Residence, Rockland Music Store.

Place of Business,

Witness: A. T. Waterman.

The piano was placed in defendant's home without any notice to him of plaintiff's claim. Subsequently he bought and paid Beale for the piano. Something over two years after the receipt of the piano plaintiff laid claim to it, which resulted in this action.

The defendant asked the court to give the jury the following instructions:

"Second. If the jury find that the defendant made his entire arrangements for the piano with the retail dealers, J. Q. Beale & Son, and that the plaintiff shipped or delivered the piano to the defendant upon an order coming from said Beale & Son, and that the plaintiff, when it should have spoken, kept silent, and gave no notice to the defendant that the said Beale & Son were not authorized to contract with the defend-

NOTE.—As to right of purchaser of personal property from person who has it under an agreement which does not give him title thereto, see also, in this series, Romeo v. Martucci (Conn.) 47 L. R. A. 601, and Woods v. Nichols (R. I.) 48 L. R. A. 773.

ant in relation to said property, and that while the plaintiff was thus silent the defendant purchased the piano from said Beale & Son, then the plaintiff is estopped from denying that the defendant acquired a good title to the piano, and the verdict should be for the defendant.

"Third. Whenever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the action of a third, the loss must be borne by the one whose behavior in the matter denoted to the other that such third person's acts were apparently trustworthy.

"Fourth. If the jury find that the plaintiff put the retail dealers J. Q. Beale & Son forward as general agent, or placed said Beale & Son in a position where the defendant was justified in the belief that Beale & Son's powers were general, then the jury may disregard any restrictions that the plaintiff privately imposed upon the agent's authority, or any private arrangement between the plaintiff and said Beale & Son that was not brought to the defendant's notice."

These instructions were refused. The jury returned a verdict in plaintiff's favor for $140, and defendant brought the case into this court.

Mr. Walter B. Grant, for defendant:

The plaintiff's silence under the circumstances was an acquiescence in whatever contract Beale & Son might make with defendant; plaintiff agreed with Beale & Son that the piano should go into defendant's possession; it knew that Beale & Son, retail dealers, were going to make a contract with defendant, and it left the details entirely to Beale & Son; it knew that defendant knew that he was dealing with a piano dealer, and not with an ordinary lessee, and that defendant would have reasonable cause to believe that the dealer was authorized to convey a title, and it knew that defendant had no knowledge of any party but Beale & Son in the transaction. Attempting thus to control the property by a lease, not disclosed to defendant and which was early violated, and then keeping inactive and silent, was negligence on plaintiff's part and a fraud on the defendant. The plaintiff gave apparent control to Beale, and failed to act or speak seasonably.

The plaintiff should be estopped from taking advantage of its own negligence.

Tracy v. Lincoln, 145 Mass. 357, 14 N. E. 122; Stiff v. Ashton, 155 Mass. 133, 29 N. E. 203; Pickard v. Sears, 6 Ad. & El. 469; Preston v. Mann, 25 Conn. 118.

There is no distinction in principle, although the party who enables another to assume the credit of ownership may not be actually present when the act is done by which the third party is deceived.

Thompson v. Blanchard, 4 N. Y. 309.

An estoppel may arise although there was no designed fraud on the part of the person sought to be estopped; it may arise, also, where there is a duty to speak, and the party upon whom the duty rests has an opportunity, and, knowing the circumstances requiring him to speak, keeps silent, and it is not necessary that the duty to speak 57 L. R. A.

should rest upon any agreement or legal obligation; it arises whenever principles of natural justice require the disclosure.

Mr. Clifton L. Bremer, for plaintiff:

The lease from the plaintiff to Beale was admissible, both for the purpose of tracing the piano from the plaintiff's to the defendant's possession, and also for the purpose of rebutting the estoppel, by showing that the relation between the plaintiff and Beale was not one of agency.

Boydton v. Loughton, 1 Allen, 509.

As the purchase of the piano occurred, by the defendant's own testimony, one year after the lease was made, nothing that the plaintiff did or neglected to do after that date (July, 1897) could act as an estoppel, as the defendant did not alter his condition in consequence of it.

Nickerson v. Darrow, 5 Allen, 419.

To create an estoppel by silence, there must be: (a) A duty to speak; (b) a knowledge of all the circumstances requiring that duty; (c) a design to have the silence acted upon; (d) a reliance by the other party upon the silence.

Collier v. Miller, 137 N. Y. 332, 33 N. E. 374; Andrews v. Lyons, 11 Allen, 349; Plumer v. Lord, 9 Allen, 455, 85 Am. Dec. 773; Stiff v. Ashton, 155 Mass. 130, 29 N. E. 203; Lincoln v. Gay, 164 Mass. 537, 42 N. E. 95; Zuchtmann v. Roberts, 109 Mass. 53, 12 Am. Rep. 663; Sargent v. Metcalf, 5 Gray, 306, 66 Am. Dec. 368.

In the present case the defendant did not offer evidence, or contend that the plaintiff had any reason to suspect Beale of contemplating a fraudulent sale of the piano. Consequently, it cannot be claimed that there was any intention on the plaintiff's part with regard to having its behavior acted upon, unless there is a presumption of law that all lessees are dishonest.

The facts calling for a duty and an estoppel in the closely analogous cases of conditional sales are very much stronger than in cases of leases like the present; but this court has uniformly held that there was no estoppel.

Burbank v. Crooker, 7 Gray, 158, 66 Am. Dec. 470; Coggill v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 3 Gray, 545.

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of tort for the conversion of a piano. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, and the case is here on exceptions by the defendant to the admission of a written lease of the piano from the plaintiff to J. Q. Beale & Son, from one of whom the defendant afterwards bought it, and to the refusal of the presiding justice to give certain rulings that were asked for, and to certain instructions that were given by him.

1. The lease was clearly admissible, we think, to show the nature of the right of Beale & Son, and to rebut any presumption of agency on their part.

2. The defendant contends that the question of the authority of Beale & Son to make the sale should have been left to the jury, and that the silence of the plaintiff, and its delay in enforcing its rights, constituted a fraud on the defendant, and estop it to assert any title to the piano. We see no ground on which either branch of the contention can stand. There was no evidence of any authority from the plaintiff to Beale & Son to sell the piano, and the court rightly so ruled and instructed the jury. They were merely lessees of the piano, and the fact that they had a retail store and kept musical instruments for sale, and that this was known to the plaintiff, did not enlarge their authority, or give them any right to sell the piano. Coggill v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 3 Gray, 545; Sargent v. Metcalf, 5 Gray, 306, 66 Am. Dec. 368; Burbank v. Crooker, 7 Gray, 158, 66 Am. Dec. 470. Neither was there any evidence of estoppel for the jury to consider, and on this question, also, the ruling of the court was right. The plaintiff was not bound to inform the defendant of the arrangement between it and Beale & Son, and it did not know, and had no reason to know or believe, that the defendant intended to purchase the piano of Beale & Son, or that they intended to sell it. The defendant did not know of the existence of the lease, and therefore could not have been led in any way to make the purchase by the delay of the plaintiff in enforcing its rights, or by its silence. The grounds of an estoppel are entirely wanting.

3. What we have said disposes of the first and second requests. In regard to the other two it is enough to say that neither was applicable to the case before the court, and both were rightly refused.

Exceptions overruled.

BOSTON ELEVATED RAILWAY COMPANY.

(.....Mass.....)

A carrier is liable for nervous shock to a passenger resulting from a jar to the nervous system which accompanies a blow to the person caused by being thrown from a seat through the carrier's negligence, and it is not necessary to show that the shock is the consequence of the blow.

(February 27, 1902.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. H. Cooney and A. I. Peckham, for defendant:

There can be no recovery for fright, terror, alarm, anxiety, or distress of mind, or for such physical injuries as may be caused by such mental disturbances, where there is no injury to the person from without.

Spade v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 168 Mass. 285, 38 L. R. A. 512, 47 N. E. 88, 172 Mass. 488, 43 L. R. A. 832, 52 N. E. 747.

The burden of compensating claimants in these prolific days of accident cases will be found still sufficiently onerous if they are restricted in their claims to injuries, real or imaginary, caused or produced by physical injury susceptible of proof or disproof,—something that can be seen or felt.

Mr. Marcellus Coggan, for plaintiff:

The defendant's negligence is the legal cause of the physical illness and nervous affections consequent on the fright, terror, and mental distress of the plaintiff, just as much as where the plaintiff, by movements induced by fright caused by defendant's careless act, does herself some physical injury.

Gannon v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 173 Mass. 40, 43 L. R. A. 833, 52 N. E. 1075.

Recovery should be allowed for mere mental fright, terror, and distress where there is no physical contact. The injury is real, not fanciful, and it is caused by defendant's wrongful act; and in a case like the present, anyhow, it is a natural and probable result of a nature that a reasonable man would foresee.

The real reason for refusing damages sustained from mere fright probably rests on the ground that in practice it is impossible satisfactorily to administer any other rule.

Spade v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 168 Mass. 285, 38 L. R. A. 512, 47 N. E. 88; White v. Sander, 168 Mass. 296, 47 N. E. 90.

The amount of physical injury should be only so much as is required by the necessity which gave rise to the rule.

Consequences of the defendant's conduct which would not of themselves constitute a cause of action may at times enhance the damages if the conduct has some other consequence for which an action lies.

Spado v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 172 Mass. 490, 43 L. R. A. 832, 52 N. E. 747.

An injury to the nerve tissues is as much a physical injury as a broken bone, and often more serious in its effects upon the physical health. Mental distress and agony form an element in the damages.

Holmes, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for personal injuries. The plaintiff was in one of the defendant's cars and was thrown against a seat, receiving a slight blow, in consequence of a collision for which the defendant was to blame. She afterwards had a good deal of suffering of a hysterical nature, and the question before us on the exceptions concerns the rule of liability for the nervous shock. It was decided in Spade v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 172 Mass. 488, 43 L. R. A. 832, 52 N. E. 747, that, if the defendant was a wrongdoer, it must answer for the actual consequences of the battery to the plaintiff as she was, although she might be abnormally nervous. It also was decided, however, that if a nervous shock was due to causes for which the defendant was not answerable, such as the behavior of a drunken man whom it was engaged in removing, it could not be held for the shock notwithstanding its liability for a battery happening at the same time. The defendant by various requests tried to press the latter principle so far as to require the plaintiff to prove that the nervous shock was the consequence of the battery, whereas the judge allowed her to recover for a shock ending in paralysis if it resulted from a jar to her nervous system which accompanied the blow to her person. It was understood, of course, that the jar was due to the same cause as the blow, and both to the defendant's fault.

We are of opinion that the judge was right, and that further refining would be wrong. As has been explained repeatedly, it is an arbitrary exception, based upon a notion of what is practicable, that prevents a recovery for visible illness resulting from nervous shock alone. Spade v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 168 Mass. 285, 288, 38 L. R. A. 512, 47 N. E. 88; Smith v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. 174 Mass. 576, 47 L. R. A. 323, 55 N. E. 380. But when there has been a battery, and the nervous shock results from the same wrongful management as the battery, it is at least equally impracticable to go further and to inquire whether the shock comes through the battery or along with it. Even were it otherwise, recognizing as we must the logic in favor of the plaintiff when a remedy is denied because the only immediate wrong was a shock to the nerves, we think that when the reality of the cause is guaranteed by proof of a substantial battery of the person there is no occasion to press further the exception to general rules. The difference between this case and the Spade Case in its second presentation is that in the latter the defendant's wrong, if any, began with the battery, and it was not responsible for the previous sources of fear, whereas here the defendant was responsible for the trouble throughout. The decisions, although not explicit, favor the conclusions to which we have come. Canning v. Williamstown, 1 Cush. 451; Warren v. Boston & M. R. Co. 163 Mass. 484, 487, 40 N. E. 895.

COMMONWEALTH of Massachusetts.

(.....Mass.....)

1. A statute requiring payment of damages for injuries to a business through the taking of property for public use is not unconstitutional on the ground that taxes cannot be levied for such purposes.
2. A doctor having an office in, and a practice extending throughout, a town in which land is taken for a public purpose, is within the protection of a statute

NOTE.—The allowance of damages for injury to a doctor's practice by the taking of property for public use is in the above case based on a statutory provision that is somewhat exceptional. As the statute expressly provided for compensation for damage to business of an individual owning an established business on land in a certain town, the case is easily distinguishable from those which deny compensation for loss of profits or diminished value of personal property caused by the removal of a business made necessary by condemnation of real property, as instances of which, see Becker v. Philadelphia & R. T. R. Co. (Pa.) 35 L. R. A. 583; and Philadelphia Ball Club v. Philadelphia (Pa.) 46 L. R. A. 724.

providing for compensation to any individual owning an established business on land within the town, which is injured by the taking.

3. The damage for injury to one "owning a business on land within a town" by the taking of property for public use for which a statute requires compensation to be made is not limited to the decrease in market value of the business.

(March 1, 1902.)

RESERVATION by the Supreme Judicial Court for Worcester County for the opinion of the full bench of questions arising upon a report of damages to be awarded plaintiff for injuries to his business arising from the condemnation of property in the town where it was located. Answers favorable to plaintiff returned.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert M. Morse, for petitioner:

While the state may not be sued in a state court without its consent (Troy & G. R. Co. v. Com. 127 Mass. 43), yet there are numerous precedents, such as the takings of the metropolitan sewerage commission, and in the law restricting the height of buildings near the state house (see Parker v. Com. 178 Mass. 199, 59 N. E. 634), for statutory provisions authorizing such suits.

The question, for what the statute gives compensation, is a matter of construction.

Lincoln v. Com. 164 Mass. 368, 41 N. E. 489.

The petitioner's claim is within the statute.

The essential point is that he should have an established business on land in West Boylston.

Nelson v. Boston & M. R. Co. 155 Mass. 356, 29 N. E. 586.

The destruction of business is not a taking of property, and the decisions as to the measure of damages, made in the case of takings, are not applicable here.

Sawyer v. Metropolitan Water Board, 178 Mass. 267, 59 N. E. 658.

The rule of damages in this case is substantially the same as if the petitioner were suing a railway or municipal corporation for a physical injury which affected his capacity to practise his profession, as in Nelson v. Boston & M. R. Co. 155 Mass. 356, 29 N. E. 586.

Braithwaite v. Hall, 168 Mass. 38, 46 N. E. 398; Murdock v. New York & B. Dispatch Exp. Co. 167 Mass. 549, 46 N. E. 57; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Frantz, 127 Pa. 297, 4 L. R. Messrs. James Mott Hallowell and Arthur W. DeGoosh, for the Commonwealth:

The plaintiff did not own an established business on land in the town of West Boylston.

Willard v. Cambridge, 3 Allen, 574.

It cannot be said the individuals and firms coming within the provisions of the statute have any moral or equitable claims which the legislature has a right to recognize, for the commonwealth has not taken or destroyed anything which they owned.

Wilkinson v. Cheatham, 43 Ga. 258; Cooley, Taxn. chap. 4, p. 91.

Holmes, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition brought by a practising physician to recover for damage to his business by the carrying out of the metropolitan water supply act. Stat. 1895, chap. 488, § 14. The case was referred to a commission. It reports that the plaintiff lived and had his office in West Boylston and had a practice which extended through that and some neighboring towns. The taking of land at West Boylston necessarily affected his business to a considerable extent, and the damages are assessed at alternative sums according to the rules suggested by the plaintiff and defendant respectively. The questions of law arising on the report were reserved by one of the justices for the consideration of the full court.

The commonwealth in the first place contends that the material portion of the statute, if it applies to cases like this, is unconstitutional. The ground seems to be that taxes cannot be levied for purposes of this sort, except to pay for property taken or destroyed, and that the business of a doctor is not properly within the principle. The test of what may be required to be paid for if destroyed or damaged under the power of eminent domain is not whether the same thing could have been sold, nor is it whether the destruction or harm could have been authorized without a provision for payment. Very likely the plaintiff's rights were of a kind that might have been damaged, if not destroyed, without the constitutional necessity of compensation. But some latitude is allowed to the legislature. It is not forbidden to be just in some cases where it is not required to be by the letter of paramount law. We think it so plain that, as was assumed by everybody in Sawyer v. Metropolitan Water Board, 178 Mass. 267, 59 N. E. 658, the provision is constitutional, that we prefer to say so without stopping to consider whether the question is open. See Opinion of the Justices, 175 Mass. 599, 49 L. R. A. 564, 57 N. E. 675; Guilford v. Chenango County, 13 N. Y. 143, 149; People ex rel. Blanding v. Burr, 13 Cal. 343; United States v. Realty Co. 103 U. S. 427, 41 L. ed. 215, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1120; Guthrie Nat. Bank v. Guthrie, 173 U. S. 528, 536, 537, 43 L. ed. 796, 800 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 513; New Orleans v. Clark, 95 U. S. 644, 24 L. ed. 521.

Next it is contended that the plaintiff was not an "individual . . . owning . . . an established business on land in the town of West Boylston" within the meaning of Stat. 1895, chap. 488, § 14. A majority of the court does not see why not. The defendant cites Ex parte Breull, L. R. 16 Ch. Div. 484, for the proposition that the word "business" has no definite technical meaning. We agree, and think it quite wide enough to include the practice of a doctor. It is suggested that the practice was not established on land in West Boylston. It is true that a doctor can give advice elsewhere than in his office, and that in fact he does so to a greater extent than a shopkeeper sells his goods outside his shop. But no less than a shopkeeper a doctor usually has, as the plaintiff had, a locally established center to which patients resort, and from which he goes his rounds. There is even a certain amount of salable goodwill, as is made familiar to us by English law and literature, as well as by an occasional case in our own reports. Smith v. Bergengren, 153 Mass. 236, 10 L. R. A. 768, 26 N. E. 690.

The defendant demanded a finding or ruling that the plaintiff's business was not decreased in value by the carrying out of the act, because of the figures given for his income in 1894 and 1895, and later. But the commission may have found, and, for all that we can see, rightly, that the diminution of income before April 1, 1895, was due to precautions taken by the plaintiff in anticipation of the change, and we are unable to say that the defendant's request should have been granted.

The defendant next contends that the measure of damages is the difference in the market value of the business between April 1, 1895, and after the act was carried out. This recurs to the notion that the only interests which the law will recognize are salable, and that the plaintiff can recover only for such goodwill as might have been transferred for cash. The word "owning" in the statute is invoked. We shall not speculate whether ownership of an equitable life estate would be denied to a legatee deprived of the right of alienation. It is enough to say that, if the plaintiff's business is within the protection of the act, and "is decreased in value," damages are to be paid for "such injury," that is to say, for the actual decrease in value of that business, not for the decrease in the value of such elements in it, only, as admitted of being sold. There is no practical difficulty in the way of carrying out the statute according to its meaning. The money value of the plaintiff's business could be estimated, even though absolutely personal to himself.

But the rule suggested by the petitioner also seems to us unsafe on the facts before us. The damage theoretically would be the difference in value between the business as it had been and as it was left. Perhaps it might be reached by taking the difference in value between the business carried on as it was in West Boylston and a similar business carried on by the plaintiff in the nearest available place, bearing in mind the effect of requiring all West Boylston patients to move. It may be that the commission will find as a practical matter that the method suggested by the petitioner is as near as can be got to the thing to be determined, but as the case stands we do not feel warranted in adopting it. The commission has not said that it could not make an estimate on more obviously correct principles. It has confined itself to finding the damages according to the rules suggested on the two sides.

A request for a ruling that what the petitioner had earned as a specialist since his abandonment of his general practice could not be considered, went too far. Undoubtedly the evidence was not very important, and probably it was not regarded as being so.

Before the state should forego its right to try or punish for violation of its laws when the offender is found within its jurisdiction there should be some plain and very positive duty. But whatever may be thought of the considerations which should influence the executive department of the state, the courts must administer the law as they find it, without regard to any supposed rights of other states not defined by law, and not asserted before them by the proper authority.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner is confined in the jail of Montcalm county under a complaint and warrant charging him with the crime of burglary, committed in that county. He seeks release upon the writ of habeas corpus, for the reason that at the time of his arrest for this crime he was confined in the jail of Kent county, Michigan, under a warrant issued from the United States court for the northern district of Ohio, charging him with the crime of robbery of postoffices in Michigan, and, under the order of the United States court in Ohio, removing him to the United States court for the western district of Michigan, to await the action of the grand jury upon said alleged offense. The marshal of the United States court for the western district of Michigan, upon the request of the sheriff of Montcalm county, and the presentation to him of the warrant for the petitioner's arrest, surrendered him to the jurisdiction of the state courts for examination and trial. His counsel insist that upon his release by the United States marshal he was entitled to return to the state of Ohio, whence he was brought under the order and judgment of the Federal court; that he was by law entitled to a reasonable time and opportunity to return, and was, during that time, privileged from arrest by the authorities of the state court. Courts have shown no inclination to scrutinize too closely the means used by police officers to secure fugitives from justice and bring them before the courts for trial. It has been repeatedly held that, when alleged criminals are brought by force or by false representation, or even by abuse of process, from one jurisdiction to which they have fled, into another, they are not entitled to return to the jurisdiction whence they were taken. Re Mahon, 34 Fed. 525, 528; Lascelles v. Georgia, 148 U. S. 537, 543, 37 L. ed. 549, 550, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 687, and authorities there cited. The prisoner, upon being discharged by the United States authorities, would not be entitled to return to Ohio, even if he had been extradited. It is just to counsel to say that they do not intend to carry their argument to this extent. If extradited for larceny, and discharged, and a charge of murder had been lodged against him, he would not be absolutely released, and given the opportunity to escape trial upon the more heinous offense. What counsel mean to say is this: That the United States marshal would take him back to Ohio, and there retain him until the necessary papers could be obtained from the governor of Michigan for his return to this state to be tried. This would be an idle ceremony.

No question of treaty stipulation is involved. Petitioner has not been extradited. He was brought to this state under a United States warrant, arrested in one jurisdiction, where the crime was not committed, and transferred to another jurisdiction, where the crime was committed, for appropriate action. But, if the case were to be disposed of upon the rules governing extradition proceedings, the controversy has been settled by Lascelles v. Georgia, 148 U. S. 537, 543, 37 L. ed. 549, 550, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 687. This is a Federal question, and the decision there made is binding, no matter what the previous decisions of this court may have been. Before the decision of that case the authorities had been divided, though we think the clear weight of authority was against the contention on behalf of petitioner. It was there expressly decided that "a fugitive from justice, surrendered by one state upon the demand of another, is not protected from prosecution for offenses other than that for which he was rendered up, but may, after being restored to the demanding state, be lawfully tried and punished for any and all crimes committed within its territorial jurisdiction, either before or after extradition." Counsel for the prisoner rely upon Re Cannon, 47 Mich. 481, 11 N. W. 280. Cannon was extradited as a fugitive from justice for a crime which was the proper subject of extradition. Upon being brought within the jurisdiction of Michigan, he was at once discharged, and proceedings for bastardy commenced against him, growing out of the same facts as those involved in the criminal charge. The court held (citing authorities) that bastardy proceedings were not criminal, but civil.

The rule is universal that one is privileged from arrest on civil process when he is brought into another jurisdiction, either as a witness or litigant, in obedience to the process of the court. The law gives him sufficient time to withdraw from the jurisdiction into which he is thus forced to come before he is subject to civil process. Only when he voluntarily enters within the jurisdiction of that court, or remains after he has had sufficient time to depart therefrom, can he be made the subject of civil process. In civil suits the defendant is entitled by law to be sued within the jurisdiction of his domicile, unless by his own act he places himself within the jurisdiction of the domicile of his adversary. This is not the rule, however, in criminal cases, which must be tried within the county and state where the crime is committed. Due protection to society against criminals forbids that they should be thus privileged from arrest for crimes, and opportunity given them to escape. A criminal acquires no right of asylum in a state to which he has fled. The court in Re Cannon were not discussing a case involving a criminal arrest, but only an arrest upon civil process. This is equally true of People ex rel. Watson v. Detroit Super. Ct. Judge, 40 Mich. 729, cited in the opinion in Cannon's Case. The language used in each case was entirely applicable to the facts, and, if anything was said which can be construed into applying to arrests for crime, it must be regarded as dictum. The decision in that case would undoubtedly have been the same if the case of Lascelles v. Georgia had been decided. Some of the language might possibly have been modified; or not used at all. This being a Federal question, as above stated, and no such question being in fact involved in Cannon's and Watson's Cases, we feel compelled to follow the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The prisoner is therefore remanded.

Long, J., did not sit. The other Justices concurred.

*Chapter 237, Laws 1901, providing for the Torrens system of registering land titles, is not unconstitutional in that it is special legislation; nor in that it deprives the owner of his interest in land without due process of law; nor in that it violates article 3 of the Constitution, vesting the powers of government in three distinct departments; nor in that examiners of title provided for by the act are appointed by the court, and not elected as county officers are required to be by § 4, art. 11, Const.

PETITION for a writ of quo warranto to determine respondent's right to the office of examiner of land titles. Writ quashed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. B. Douglas, Attorney General, and Childs, Edgerton, & Wickwire, for relator:

The legislature is not authorized by the Constitution to classify counties for the purposes expressed in chapter 237, Laws 1901.

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an information in the nature of quo warranto to determine the respondent's right to the office of examiner of titles, to which he interposed a general demurrer. The sole issue of law raised by the demurrer is this: Is chapter 237, Laws 1901, by virtue of which the respondent was appointed such examiner, providing for the Torrens system of registering land titles, constitutional? The basic principle of this system is the registration of the title of land, instead of registering, as the old system requires, the evidence of such title. In the one case only the ultimate fact or conclusion that a certain named party has title to a particular tract of land is registered, and a certificate thereof delivered to him. In the other the entire evidence, from which proposed purchasers must, at their peril, draw such conclusion, is registered. Necessarily the initial registration of the title—that is, the conclusive establishment of a starting point binding upon all the world—must rest upon judicial proceedings. The act in question provides for such proceedings, and the full details thereof, which will be referred to as we proceed. The act, by its terms, applies only to counties having more than 75,000 inhabitants, and registration is made optional with the landowner. It is the contention of the relator that the act is unconstitutional for the reasons:

1. It is special legislation, contravening §§ 33 and 34 of article 4 of the state Constitution, because the classification of counties according to population for the purposes of the act is unauthorized. Population, if not limited to the present, may be a basis of classification of counties for the purposes of legislation if germane to the purpose of the law; otherwise not. State ex rel. Duluth v. St. Louis County Dist. Ct. 61 Minn. 548, 64 N. W. 190; State ex rel. Anderson v. Sullivan, 72 Minn. 127, 75 N. W. 8; State ex rel. Douglas v. Ritt, 76 Minn. 531, 79 N. W. 535; Murray v. Ramsey County, 81 Minn. 359, 51 L. R. A. 828, 84 N. W. 103. The subject of classification of counties on the basis of population is an embarrassing one for the courts, for the reason that numerous and complex considerations enter into it, and it is often difficult to determine whether there is any natural relation between the population of counties of the given class and the subject-matter of the law classifying them. Alexander v. Duluth, 77 Minn. 448, 80 N. W. 623. If it is clear that there is no natural relation or connection between the population of counties of a particular class and the subject-matter of the statutes so classifying them for the purposes of legislation, courts ought unhesitatingly to hold them unconstitutional; otherwise it would sanction the classification of counties on the basis of population for any and all purposes of legislation, whereby the constitutional amendment forbidding special legislation would be deprived of all virility. On the other hand, courts ought never to be unmindful of the fact that the lawmaking power is vested in the legislature. Therefore, if there be any facts fairly calling for the exercise of legislative discretion in the classification of particular subdivisions of the state for the purposes of legislation, courts cannot review such discretion, and declare statutes making such classifications invalid, simply because they differ with the legislature as to the propriety of the classification. It is only when the classification is so manifestly arbitrary as to evince a legislative purpose of evading the provisions of the Constitution that the courts may and must declare the classification unconstitutional. In considering the constitutionality of a statute, courts will take judicial notice of all facts relevant to the question. State ex rel. Courthouse & City Hall Comrs. v. Cooley, 56 Minn. 540, 58 N. W. 150; State ex rel. Marr v. Stearns, 72 Minn. 200, 75 N. W. 210. If, then, the classification attempted in this act is merely an arbitrary one, it is special legislation, and void. But, if facts exist of which we may take judicial notice, which fairly suggest the practical necessity or propriety of different legislation in respect to land titles in counties of over 75,000 inhabitants than in the other counties of the state, the act is valid. With whether the law is a wise or an unwise one we have nothing to do. We are of the opinion that the facts that the largest cities of the state are within the limits of the classified counties, that the platted portions thereof embrace a greater number of subdivisions and parcels of land than the less densely populated portions of the state, that the individual owners of the land are more numerous, the value thereof much greater, and that the records of the evidence of the titles thereto rapidly increase in volume, and become more complex with the increase of population, whereby the risks of defective titles, and expenses for abstracts thereof, and the delays and difficulties in transferring real estate, are proportionately increased, were proper for the consideration of the legislature in determining whether there was a practical necessity or propriety for the classification in question, and justify it. The differences suggested are to some extent differences in degree (see Murray v. Ramsey County, 81 Minn. 359, 84 N. W. 103), but they are not wholly so, for many of them are essential differences in the conditions and needs in the premises of the three most populous counties of the state and those of the other counties having a much smaller population. It does not appear in this case that the classification was purely arbitrary; on the contrary, the facts suggest a natural reason therefor, which made it a question solely for the legislature. We therefore hold that the act is not void as special legislation.

2. The act is void because it contemplates the taking of property without due process of law, in violation of both state and Federal Constitutions. The act provides, among other things, that the owner of any estate or interest in land may have the title thereto registered by making an application in writing, stating certain facts, to the district court of the county wherein the land is situated. Thereupon the court has power to inquire into the state of the title, and make all decrees necessary to determine it against all persons, known or unknown. The application must be filed and docketed in the office of the clerk of the court, and a duplicate thereof filed with the register of deeds, who is ex officio registrar of titles. The application is then referred by the court to an examiner of titles, who investigates the titles, and inquires as to the truth of the allegations of the application, particularly whether the land is occupied or not, and makes and files a report of his examination with the clerk. Upon the filing of the report the clerk issues a summons by order of the court, wherein the applicant is named as plaintiff, and the land described, and all other persons known to have any interest in or claim to the land and "all other persons or parties unknown" claiming any interest in the real estate described in the application are named as defendants. The summons must be directed to such defendants, and require them to appear and answer within twenty days. It must be served in the manner now provided for the service of summons in civil action, with this exception: that the summons shall be served on non-resident defendants and upon all unknown persons by publishing it in a newspaper printed and published in the county where the application is filed once a week for three consecutive weeks. In addition to such publication the clerk shall, within twenty days after the first publication, mail a copy of the summons to all nonresident defendants whose place or address is known, and the court may order such additional notice of the application as it may direct. Any interested party may appear and answer. If no appearance is made, the court may enter the default, but must take proof of the applicant's right to a decree, and is not bound by the report of the examiner, but may require further proof. If appearance is made, the case shall be set down for trial, and heard as other civil actions. If the court finds that the applicant has title proper for registration, a decree confirming the title and ordering registration shall be entered. Every such decree shall bind the lands and quiet title thereto, except as otherwise provided in the act, and shall be forever binding and conclusive upon all persons, whether mentioned by name or included in the expression "all other persons or parties unknown," and such decree shall not be open by the reason of absence, infancy, or other disability, or any proceedings at law for reversing judgment, except as provided in the act, but appeals may be taken to the supreme court as any other civil action. Any person who has any interest in the land, and who has not actually been served or notified of the filing of the application, may at any time within sixty days from the entry of such decree appear, and file his sworn answer, providing no innocent purchaser for value has acquired an interest. If there is any such purchaser, the decree of registration remains in full force forever, subject only to the right of appeal, and the person aggrieved must look for his relief to the assurance fund mentioned in the act, and to any person procuring the decree by fraud. Every person receiving a certificate of title and every subsequent purchaser in good faith takes the same free from all encumbrances, except such as are noted thereon. Upon entering the decree of registration, a certified copy thereof must be filed by the clerk in the office of the registrar of titles, who proceeds to register the title pursuant to the decree. This he does by entering an original certificate in the registrar of titles, and delivering a duplicate thereof to the owner, who may thereafter convey his title by the execution of deeds and the surrender of his certificate to the registrar for cancellation, who issues a new certificate to the purchaser. No title to registered land in derogation of that of the registered owner shall be acquired by prescription or adverse possession. The judges of the district court are required to appoint one or more attorneys as examiners of title, whose salaries are to be fixed by the board of county commissioners. Such examiners may act as referees on any pending application, but all their acts are subject to review by the district court. Every applicant must pay one-tenth of 1 per cent on the assessed value of the land to be registered for the purpose of creating an assurance fund, to be held in trust for the benefit of anyone sustaining loss by the operation of the act. Such is a brief outline of the provisions of the act, which it is necessary to have in mind when considering the question whether the act authorizes the taking of property without due process of law. Counsel for the relator suggests several objections to the law, which are not germane to the particular question whether the act contemplates the taking of property without due process of law. Attention is called to the fact that the act (§ 20) allows the defendant twenty days after the service of the summons in which to appear and answer, while by the prescribed form of the summons they are required to answer in ten days. This discrepancy does not affect the constitutionality of the law, or its practical operation, for it is apparent, when all of the provisions of the act as to the summons and the time within which the defendants must answer are considered, that the prescribed form of the summons, in so far as it requires the answer to be filed in ten days, must yield to the other express provisions upon the subject, and twenty days be substituted in the form for ten days. Again, it is suggested that land held under a registered title cannot be gained or lost by adverse possession, while all land in the counties of the state to which the act does not apply may be so lost or gained; and, further, that the landowners in the counties to which the act applies have a remedy for clearing their titles from clouds, and quieting them, not accorded to other landowners of the state. These are suggestions pertinent to the legislative question of classification, but not to the question whether the procedure for securing a decree quieting the title to the land as a basis for the initial registration is due process of law. If the classification was authorized, none of the suggested matters render the act invalid. It is also contended by the relator that under the provisions of the act a person may be in actual possession of land the title to which is to be registered and service made upon him by publication, which may result in his being registered out of his title thereto without ever having any actual knowledge of the judicial proceeding instituted to secure a decree clearing and quieting a title as a basis for the initial registration. If this be the correct construction of the provisions of the act relating to the service of the summons, they do not constitute due process of law. Baker v. Kelly, 11 Minn. 480, Gil. 358. But the act is not reasonably susceptible of such a construction. The application for registration must be presented to the district court of the county in which the land is situate; hence such occupant is not a nonresident party, nor an unknown one. Having possession of the land, he has an apparent interest therein, and, if he is not the applicant, must be made a party defendant, and the summons served upon him as in civil actions. It is only on nonresidents and unknown persons or parties that service by publication may be made. Nor is this all. One of the matters which the examiner is particularly charged with the duty of investigating and reporting upon is the occupation of the land, to the end that the court may be advised as to all adverse claimants in possession, that they may be made parties to the proceedings, and served with the summons. It is not reasonably possible, if the mandates of the act are observed, that in any case the occupant of the land would not be made a party to the proceeding, and duly served with the summons. Actions and proceedings to conclusively establish rights and titles against all claimants and parties, known and unknown, are not novelties in our jurisprudence, for decrees probating wills, distributing estates of deceased persons, quieting title to real estate against unknown heirs and unknown parties, have been repeatedly held to be conclusive on the whole world. It is now the settled doctrine of this court that the district courts of this state may be clothed with full power to inquire into and conclusively adjudicate the state of the title of all land within their respective jurisdictions, after actual notice to all of the known claimants within the jurisdiction of the court, and constructive notice by publication of the summons to all other persons or parties, whether known or unknown, having or appearing to have some interest in or claim thereto. The proceeding provided for by the act in question is such a one. It is substantially one in rem, the subject-matter of which is the state of the title of land within the jurisdiction of the court, and the provisions of the act for the serving the summons and giving notice of the pendency of the proceeding are full and complete, and satisfy both the state and Federal Constitutions. To hold otherwise would be to hold that the courts of this state cannot in any manner acquire jurisdiction to clear and quiet the title to real estate by a decree binding all interests and all persons or parties, known or unknown, for the provisions of this act are as full and complete as to giving notice to all interested parties as it is reasonably possible to make them. That the courts of this state have jurisdiction to so clear and quiet title by their decrees is no longer an open question in this state. Shepherd v. Ware, 46 Minn. 174, 48 N. W. 773; Inglee v. Welles, 53 Minn. 197, 55 N. W. 117; McClymond v. Noble, 84 Minn. 329, 87 N. W. 838. See also Mayall v. Mayall, 63 Minn. 511, 65 N. W. 942, and Mathews v. Lightner (Minn.) 88 N. W. 992.

It is further claimed by the relator that the provision of the act which limits the exercise of the right to a party not actually served with process or notified of the proceeding to apply to the court to open the decree and permit him to answer to sixty days after the entry of the decree, and that no proceeding shall be had for the recovery of the land after that time, is unconstitutional. It is urged in this connection that the legislature cannot require a person in the unchallenged possession of land to commence an action or institute any proceeding within a limited time to vindicate his claim, or be barred of all rights in the premises. This is true. Baker v. Kelley, 11 Minn. 480, Gil. 358. But it is equally true that when a party so in possession is by a summons served as in civil actions, and thereby notified that the land he occupies is claimed by another, and that he is required to appear in court and defend against the claim, he must so do, or be conclusively barred by the judgment entered in the proceeding. Now, as already suggested, all persons in possession of the land must be made parties to the proceeding to secure the registration of the title thereto, and the summons must be served upon them. If the act is complied with, it is extremely improbable that an adverse claimant in actual possession of the land would fail of receiving notice of the pendency of the proceeding to register the title. However this may be, it is reasonably clear, and we so hold, that the particular provision of the act, which, in effect, forbids the commencement or the defense, in opposition to the decree, of any action or proceeding to recover the land brought more than sixty days after the entry of the decree, does not apply to an adverse claimant in the actual possession of the land, upon whom the summons is not served; for, being in possession, he cannot bring such an action, and his right to defend his possession and title in such a case cannot be made to depend upon his nonaction. So construed, the provision of the act, both as to the opening of the decree and as to the commencement of any action or proceeding to recover the land in opposition to the decree, is valid as a statute of limitations. The time limit seems to us to be a short one, but, in view of the complete and far-reaching provisions of the act for notice to all parties, and the fact that the right of appeal as in civil actions is given, we cannot hold that the legislature arbitrarily exercised its discretion in fixing the limit. State v. Messenger, 27 Minn. 119, 6 N. W. 457; Russell v. H. C. Akeley Lumber Co. 45 Minn. 376, 48 N. W. 3; London & N. W. American Mortg. Co. v. Gibson, 77 Minn. 394, 80 N. W. 205, 777; Henningsen v. Stillwater, 81 Minn. 215, 83 N. W. 983. Our conclusion, then, is that the act is not unconstitutional in that it deprives parties of their interest in land without due process of law. Similar statutes providing for the Torrens system of registration have been sustained against a like objection by the courts of other states in carefully considered opinions. Tyler v. Registration Ct. Judges, 175 Mass. 71, 51 L. R. A. 433, 55 N. E. 812; People ex rel. Deneen v. Simon, 176 Ill. 165, 44 L. R. A. 801, 52 N. E. 910. A contrary ruling was made in the case of State ex rel. Monnett v. Guilbert, 56 Ohio St. 575, 38 L. R. A. 519, 47 N. E. 551; but the provisions of the statute passed upon in that case as to notice to all persons having any possible interest in the land were not as full as they are in our statute.

3. The act, in so far as it attempts to confer upon the district courts the power to appoint examiners of titles, is void, because it violates article 3 of the state Constitution, vesting the powers of government in three distinct departments. The claim is without merit. Judicial power includes the authority to appoint all necessary subordinate officers and assistants essential to the conducting of judicial business. The examiners provided for by this act are subordinate officers or assistants of the courts, to aid them in the discharge of the judicial duties imposed upon them by the act. It was therefore competent and proper for the legislature to provide for their appointment by the courts, as much so as would be a statute authorizing them to appoint a stenographer or a receiver in insolvency. Nor does the act contravene article 3 of the Constitution by conferring judicial duties upon the registrars of titles, for it expressly provides that "all acts performed by registrars . . . shall be performed under rules and instructions established and given by the district court having jurisdiction of the county in which they act." The registration is the act of the court. The fact that it may be done by the registrar, under general orders, where there is no question, is not different from the power of the clerk to enter judgment, in cases ripe for judgment, under a general order or rule of the court. Tyler v. Registration Ct. Judges, 175 Mass. 71, 51 L. R. A. 433, 55 N. E. 812. Nor does the act attempt to make the court a registration office, as relator claims. It simply confers upon the court certain judicial duties incident to the plan of registering land titles provided by the act.

4. The last reason urged why the act is invalid is that the office of examiner of titles is a county office, which must be filled by popular election, as required by § 4 of article 11 of the state Constitution. Examiners of titles are not county officers, within the meaning of this constitutional provision, for the reason already stated in connection with the consideration of the question as to the power of the court to appoint them.

We therefore hold that chapter 237, Laws 1901, is constitutional.

Writ quashed.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

William THOMSEN et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.

HALL COUNTY.

(.....Neb.....)

1. An action brought against a county treasurer and his bondsmen for the recovery of moneys alleged to have been converted by such treasurer is not prematurely brought, if commenced after the termination of the office of such treasurer, and after he has given a bond and qualified as his own successor in office.

2. In this state a county treasurer is an insurer of the funds which come into his hands ex officio, and such treasurer and his bondsmen cannot, in an action by the county to recover funds not accounted for, plead that such funds were lost, without any fault or neglect on the part of the treasurer, by the failure of a bank in which they were deposited for safe keeping only, and in good faith, believing such bank to be solvent.

3. In an action by a county against a county treasurer and his bondsmen to recover funds alleged to have been converted by the treasurer, it is not error to compute interest on such funds from the date at which, under the terms of the statute and the official bond, the funds should have been accounted for and turned over to the successor in office of such treasurer.

(February 6, 1902.)

ERROR to the District Court for Hall County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action upon the county treasurer's bond. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. W. H. Thompson and O. A. Abbott, for plaintiffs in error:

Assuming the facts set out in the petition to be true, it was clearly the duty of the county board to remove this officer and appoint another in his stead.

State ex rel. Craig v. Sheldon, 10 Neb. 452, 6 N. W. 757.

Until he is removed he is the only person authorized to receive or receipt for moneys due the county; and what is there to prevent him from going to the clerk's office and releasing this judgment and acknowledging payment thereof?

Washington County v. Semler, 41 Wis. 374.

The petition alleges two causes of action, and alleges them in the alternative,—“conversion or negligence.” These have but one feature common to both, and that is negative in its character. Neither can be based on the consent of the plaintiff. Negligence, broadly, consists in doing something which a man of ordinary prudence would not do, or failing to do something a prudent man should have done; conversion is the doing of some act an honest man would not do. Conversion can never be based on nonfeasance. As prudent men do not keep large sums of money about their persons or in fireproof safes or vaults, we would have been clearly guilty of negligence had we done so.

Law's Estate, 144 Pa. 499, 14 L. R. A. 103, 22 Atl. 831.

The law contemplates that the county board shall provide a place for the safe keeping of county funds.

Had the principal provided a safe place for the keeping of his money, then the agent would have been responsible had he kept it somewhere else and loss had followed by reason of his acts.

Prior to United States v. Prescott, 3 How. 578, 11 L. ed. 734, the law of bailment applied to custodians of public moneys the same as to custodians of private funds.

The defendant Thomssen had already been removed from office by reason of the expiration of the term in which he defaulted. The fact that he was elected as his own successor, for a distinct and separate term of office, places the county in no worse position than if an entire stranger had been elected as his successor.

Mr. W. S. Pearne also for defendant in error.

Kirkpatrick, C., filed the following opinion:

This is an action brought by the county of Hall against William Thomssen and the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, a corporation, defendants. Plaintiff in its petition recited the election of the defendant Thomssen to the office of county treasurer of Hall county; the execution, delivery, and approval of the bond upon which plaintiff in error the Fidelity & Deposit Company was surety; and the fact that Thomssen entered upon the discharge of his duties as county treasurer, and held the office for the term of two years and until the 4th day of January, 1898; that he had received from his predecessor in office and from other sources, as county treasurer, the sum of $357,317.89, and that he had paid out and disbursed, together with what he had on hand and turned over to himself as his own successor, the sum of $335,332.28, and no more, leaving as a balance due the county the sum of $21,985.61, for which amount, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from January 4, 1898, the county prayed judgment. Plaintiffs in error filed separate answers, in which they admitted the election of Thomssen as county treasurer, and the execution and approval of his bond as set out in the petition, and in addition set out two defenses, each of which applies to a portion of, and, taken together, cover, the money alleged to have been converted: First, it is alleged that the Bank of Commerce of Grand Island had, during the term of office of the predecessor of Thomssen, given a bond to the county, and been made a county depository for the sum of $10,000, which had been deposited therein by the predecessor of Thomssen, and which sum was a part of the amount sought to be recovered by the county; that, for reasons pleaded in the answer, said sum had never been turned over to Thomssen, but still remained in the Bank of Commerce, on deposit to the credit of the county. To this portion of the answer a reply was filed by the county, which, in effect, admitted the allegations of the answer, and pleaded that the predecessor of Thomssen had given him a check for the $10,000 so on deposit, and that Thomssen had presented the check at the bank, and had it certified, and allowed the funds to remain on deposit, and that Thomssen and his bondsmen by such act became liable to the county for the same. To this reply plaintiffs in error demurred, which demurrer was by the trial court sustained; the court's ruling thereon not being presented for consideration in this case. As to the remainder of the money alleged in the petition to have been converted by plaintiff in error Thomssen, it was alleged in the answers, in substance, that the Bank of Commerce was a corporation duly incorporated as a bank, and was at the time of his election, and for many years prior thereto had been, engaged in the banking business in the city of Grand Island; that it was then, and for many years past had been, generally known as a financially sound and safe depository for moneys, and was then believed to be safe; that at the time Thomssen entered upon the discharge of his duties as treasurer the county had provided no safe or secure place for the deposit or keeping of large sums of money, but had provided simply a fireproof safe and vault suitable for the purpose of keeping the records and valuable papers of the county, to prevent their loss and destruction by fire, and that the safe or vault was not a secure, safe, or suitable place in which to keep moneys of the county; that there were no banks in the county which had given bonds and were lawful depository banks; that plaintiff in error Thomssen, in good faith, and for the sole purpose of securely keeping and preserving the moneys belonging to the county, deposited a part of the moneys which came into his hands as treasurer in the Bank of Commerce to his credit as county treasurer, and not otherwise, and that such deposit was with the full knowledge and consent of the board of supervisors of the county, and that on or about the 20th day of January, 1896, the Bank of Commerce failed, suspended payment, closed its doors, and surrendered all of its assets and property into the hands of the state banking board, and that thereafter a receiver was appointed, who paid as dividends on the money so deposited the sum of $6,415.05, leaving a balance in said bank to the credit of the county treasurer of $9,450.38; that plaintiff in error Thomssen, by reason of the premises, was not liable for this balance; that he had acted in good faith and with due care and diligence; and that the money was lost without any fault or negligence on his part. A jury was called to try the issues, and plaintiffs in error tendered evidence in support of the above set out portions of their answers, whereupon defendant in error interposed a demurrer ore tenus, which was sustained. Plaintiffs in error excepted to this ruling, and no further evidence being offered or received, the court instructed the jury to return a verdict for the county in the sum of $9,450.38, with interest at 7 per cent thereon from January 4, 1898. Judgment was entered against plaintiffs in error on this verdict, separate motions for new trials were made and overruled, and the case brought to this court upon separate petitions in error for review.

Plaintiffs in error, in their brief, contend that the judgment of the trial court is erroneous for three reasons: First, because the action was prematurely brought; second, because the answer hereinbefore quoted constituted a good defense; and, third, because the court erred in allowing interest at 7 per cent from January 4, 1898, rather than from August 4, 1898, the date of the commencement of the suit. These assignments of error will be considered in their order.

In support of the first assignment it is contended that it was the duty of the county of Hall, under the provisions of § 1, art. 2, chap. 18, Comp. Stat. 1901, entitled Counties and County Officers, and under the provisions of § 94, art. 1, of the same chapter, on the 4th day of January, 1898,—the date on which the term of Thomssen as county treasurer expired,—to have required him to account for the funds in his custody and control, and that, upon his failure so to account, it was the duty of the county board to remove him from office and appoint a successor as county treasurer, and that because the county board failed to do this, and plaintiff in error Thomssen succeeded himself by re-election, there was no officer or person who could make a legal demand to turn over the county funds in his possession, and that no suit could be maintained by the county for funds in his hands during his first term of office until such legal demand had been made, and compliance therewith refused. The authorities cited by plaintiffs in error do not sustain this contention. There can be no doubt that under the statute the term of office of Thomssen expired, at the very latest, when he gave his bond, and qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of the office as his own successor. It is equally certain that upon his qualification for his new term he was another and distinct officer, to the same extent as though some other person had succeeded him. The sureties on his bond given for his first term would not be liable for any act of misfeasance on his part during his second term, and his second-term bondsmen would not be liable for money which never in fact came into his hands from himself as his own predecessor. In the case of Amherst Bank v. Root, 2 Met. 536, it is said: "If there be a re-election, it is in fact to another, and not the same, office,—such as the offices of treasurers of the state, counties, towns, and the like, where the office is created by law, and by the same law made annual." In Citizens' Loan Assn. v. Nugent, 40 N. J. L. 215, 29 Am. Rep. 230, it is said: "A man who is re-elected to an office may be truly said to have changed his official personality. Such a person, with respect to his position, is another officer, and it is in this sense that a man is sometimes said in these cases to be his own successor." In Thruston v. Clark, 107 Cal. 286, 40 Pac. 435, it is said: "Each term of office is an entity separate and distinct from all other terms of the same office." If this action had been brought prior to the 4th day of January, 1898, and during the continuance of the first term of office of plaintiff in error Thomssen, then there would be merit in this contention. It was properly the duty of the board of supervisors, under the terms of the statute cited, to have removed plaintiff in error from office, or to have refused to approve the bond tendered by him for his second term; but that there was a failure to perform this duty by the county board cannot prejudice the rights of the county in this action. It is very clear that the first contention of plaintiffs in error cannot be sustained.

It is next contended that the county treasurer, under the law of this state, is only a bailee for hire of the moneys that come into his hands by virtue of his office; that Thomssen having in good faith deposited the money of the county in the Bank of Commerce, which was at that time believed to be a safe and responsible banking institution, and these deposits being made with the knowledge of the county board, and the county having failed to furnish a safe and suitable place in which to keep the funds, therefore the answer of plaintiffs in error stated a good defense; and that the loss of the money must fall upon the county. This view is very ably presented by counsel for plaintiffs in error, and many authorities are cited which it is claimed support the doctrine stated. We have carefully examined these authorities, and are constrained to say that many of them were decided under statutes differing materially from our own, and the bonds therein involved differed materially from that involved herein. The weight of authority seems to be that the county treasurer is an insurer of the money coming into his hands by virtue of his office, and that such officer is liable absolutely to account for such funds, and, if funds are lost by the failure of a bank in which they have been deposited, the treasurer and his bondsmen must bear such loss. Fairchild v. Hedges, 14 Wash. 117, 31 L. R. A. 851, 44 Pac. 125; State v. Nevin, 19 Nev. 162, 7 Pac. 650; Wilson v. Wichita County, 67 Tex. 647, 4 S. W. 67; Redwood County v. Tower, 28 Minn. 45, 8 N. W. 907; Lowry v. Polk County, 51 Iowa, 50, 33 Am. Rep. 114, 49 N. W. 1049; Mason v. Erie County Directors of Poor, 126 Pa. 445, 17 Atl. 616; Omro v. Kaime, 39 Wis. 468; Rose v. Douglass Twp. 52 Kan. 451, 34 Pac. 1046. 57 L. R. A.

But if the weight of authority were as claimed by counsel, the rule could not obtain in this state. By the terms of § 21, art. 3, chap. 18, Comp. Stat. 1901, it is made a felony for the county treasurer to deposit money of the county in any bank other than such as may be deposited under the provisions of the depository law, and under this section it may be said that plaintiff in error Thomssen was violating a plain provision of the statute by making the deposit on account of which the loss occurred. And it seems clear that neither he nor his bondsmen can ask to be released from liability for the loss of money so wrongfully deposited. By § 91, art. 1, chap. 18, Comp. Stat. 1901, it is made the duty of the county treasurer to receive all moneys belonging to the county, from whatsoever source derived, and to pay out all moneys received by him for the use of the county, only on warrants issued by the county board according to law, except where special provision for the payment thereof is or may be otherwise made by law. By § 89 of the same chapter it is provided that the county clerk shall keep an account with the county treasurer, in which account he shall be charged with all moneys received by him, from whatever source derived, together with all taxes due, as shown by the tax lists, and in which he is to be credited only with uncollected taxes, and with the moneys he pays out in accordance with law. We find no provision in this section under which the treasurer may be credited with moneys that may have been lost, even though the loss occurred without any fault or neglect on his part. By § 21, chap. 10, Comp. Stat. 1901, it is provided that "any officer or person who is intrusted with funds belonging to the state or any county thereof, which may come into his possession by any appropriation or otherwise, shall be responsible for the same upon his bond." From an examination of these sections of the statute, it seems very clear that the purpose of the legislature was to make the county treasurer an insurer,—responsible absolutely for the repayment of all moneys which might come into his hands from any source,—and that from this liability, which under the law is absolute, neither he nor his bondsmen can be permitted to escape, even though the loss occurred through no fault or neglect of the treasurer. By § 23, art. 3, chap. 18, Comp. Stat. 1901, it is provided "that no treasurer shall be liable on his bond for money on deposit in bank under and by direction of the proper legal authority, if said bank has given bonds." From the provisions of this section, specifically exempting the treasurer from liability on his bond for funds deposited in a proper depository, it seems clear that the legislature understood that, under the other sections referred to, the treasurer's liability was absolute, requiring him to account for all other moneys.

An examination of the terms of the bond does not disclose anything that would in any way assist plaintiffs in error to avoid the liability which seems to have been fixed by statute. Among the conditions contained in the bond we find the following: "Now, it the said William Thomsen shall render a true account of his office, and of the doings therein, to the proper authorities, when required thereby or by law, and shall promptly pay over to the persons or officers entitled thereto all moneys which may come into his hands by virtue of his said office, and shall faithfully account for all the balances of money remaining in his hands at the termination of his office," etc. It will thus be seen that by the terms of his bond, as well as by the provisions of the statute, plaintiffs in error are liable to account for all moneys coming into the hands of Thomsen as treasurer.

It cannot be said that the question is a new one in this state. In the case of Bush v. Johnson County, 48 Neb. 1, 32 L. R. A. 223, 66 N. W. 1023, this court said: "The duty imposed on a county treasurer by law, and assumed by him, of safely keeping, accounting for, and turning over the public funds which come into his hands by virtue of his office, is an absolute one; and, where his bond is conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of the office by him, the sureties on the bond are bound and liable in like manner, and their responsibility is the same as that of their principal, and it will be no defense for either of the parties, in an action on the bond to recover public funds, predicated on an alleged failure of the treasurer to account for or pay them over, that the funds have been lost or stolen without the fault or negligence of the treasurer." It is said that the language just quoted is obiter dictum, and therefore not authority in the determination of the question under consideration. An examination of that opinion, however, shows that the language quoted was used in answer to the contention of Bush and his bondsmen, who pleaded in the action brought against them that the money sought to be recovered was lost in a reputable and presumably solvent bank that the treasurer had used due diligence in safeguarding the funds, and that they were lost through no fault or neglect on his part. Thus it is seen that the exact question here presented was decided in the Bush Case, and adversely to the contention of plaintiffs in error. It may therefore be said to be the settled law in this state, that a county treasurer is an insurer of the funds that come into his hands by virtue of his office, and that he and his bondsmen are liable for moneys lost by the failure of the banks in which moneys of the county are deposited, except where deposits are made in conformity with the depository act.

It is also contended that the county treasurer was justified in violating the law by depositing the funds in the Bank of Commerce, because the board of supervisors had failed to provide a suitably safe place to keep the funds, and that they knew that the county treasurer was depositing the funds in this bank. This contention is untenable. The county supervisors, as public officers, are not charged with the keeping of the county funds; and the rule is so elementary as to require no citation of authorities, that the public rights cannot be prejudiced by the fact that the supervisors knew that the county treasurer was violating the law; and the situation would be the same even though they connived at such violation.

It is next contended that the trial court erred in instructing the jury to return a verdict for interest at the rate of 7 per cent from the 4th day of January, 1898, up to the date of the trial. We are unable to find merit in this contention. Under the law, and by the terms of his bond, Thomsen was required to have on hand and account for this money at the end of his term, which was January 4, 1898. The county had a right to the use of the money at that time, with which to meet its obligations and stop interest on outstanding claims. The money in the hands of the treasurer was due at that time. That was the day on which, by the terms of his bond, he had agreed to account and turn over to his successor this money. Under the provisions of § 4, chap. 44, Comp. Stat. 1901, it would seem that interest should be computed from January 4, 1898, when the money became due. Chenango County v. Birdsall, 4 Wend. 453; People v. Gasherie, 9 Johns. 71, 6 Am. Dec. 263; Board of Justices v. Fennimore, 1 N. J. L. 242.

From what has been said, it follows that there is no error in the proceedings of the trial court, and it is therefore recommended that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

Day and Hastings, CC., concur.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Essex County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edward Wade Benjamin, for plaintiff in error:

An express invitation to enter upon the premises of another, whether for the sole benefit of the person invited, or for their mutual benefit, imposes a duty on the owner to use reasonable care, so that the other party shall not be injured.

A mere licensee can recover where he has been injured willfully by the defendant, or where the circumstances are such that concealment of hidden dangers would amount to a fraud.

Vanderbeck v. Hendry, 34 N. J. L. 467.

The defendants are bound by the acts of Mr. Silvernail done in the interest of his principals, although unauthorized, if the limitations or scope of employment are not known to the plaintiff, and they are within the agent's apparent authority.

The plaintiff was on the premises of the defendants on what she supposed was the business of the defendants; and while there she submitted herself to be directed by their agent, who was in sole charge of the premises at the time.

Persons left in charge of premises by their principals are empowered to take charge of them, at least for protection, and to control and direct, with that object in view, the conduct of strangers who may come upon the premises during that time.

In view of the circumstances under which the plaintiff was acting, the nearness of the danger, the erroneous impression in her mind as to the character of the place created by Silvernail, the immediate consequence of a wrong step, will not justify the court in withholding the questions of negligence and contributory negligence from the jury.

Mr. Louis Hood for defendants in error.

Pitney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of tort for negligence, and upon the trial the plaintiff's evidence tended to prove the following facts: The plaintiff, a woman of sixty-one years of age, kept a small place of business in Newark, and the defendants were the proprietors of a meat shop near by, which was in the charge of one Silvernail, as manager. The plaintiff owned a domestic cat, of which she desired to be rid, and this fact she made known to Silvernail, who told her that the defendants needed a cat, and suggested that she bring it over to them. This she did a few days later, and on arriving at the meat shop found Silvernail, and also Mr. Swift, one of the defendants. As the plaintiff arrived at the place, the cat jumped from her arms and ran home, whereupon Mr. Swift said, "You must bring her over later." Accordingly, a few days later, plaintiff again carried over the cat, and upon entering the defendants' premises found Silvernail there alone. As she entered, she told him that he must put the cat in a closet, or else she would run away again. Silvernail thereupon walked to the opposite side of the room, opened a door, and said, "Put her in here." Plaintiff supposed it to be a closet, as she had requested him to put the cat in a closet. She testified that Silvernail only partially opened the door, "so that she could just get in to get the cat in," and that, as he opened the door, she anxiously ran and stooped to put the cat down, and did not see beyond the door, partly because it was dark there, and partly because a butcher's frock was hanging on the door. She says that she had the cat in her arms at the time, and it was scratching at her, and she was anxious to get the cat out of her arms; that she did not look in, but took it for granted the opening led to a closet. In fact the door opened upon a flight of stairs leading down to the cellar, and she stepped inside without looking, fell downstairs, and sustained injuries, to recover damages for which she brought this action against the defendants. Upon the evidence above indicated the plaintiff rested her case, whereupon the court granted the defendants' motion to nonsuit. To this ruling exception was taken, and the writ of error brings that ruling here for review. From the evidence the jury would have had a right to infer that the entrance of the plaintiff upon the defendants' premises was for their mutual benefit, and not for her benefit solely. Thereupon the plaintiff invokes the rule of law which was made the basis of the decision of this court in Phillips v. Burlington Library Co. 55 N. J. L. 307, 27 Atl. 478, and is exemplified in other recent cases, including that of Furey v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (decided by this court at the present term) 51 Atl. 505, viz., that the owner or occupier of lands, who, by invitation, express or implied, induces persons to come upon his premises, or to make use of the premises for a given purpose, is under a duty to exercise ordinary care to render the premises reasonably safe for such use. The application of this rule always depends upon the particular facts and circumstances of the case under consideration. The owner's liability for the condition of the premises is only coextensive with his invitation. And it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to show, not only that her entry upon the premises was by invitation of the owner, but also that at the time the injury was received she was in that part of the premises into which she was invited to enter, and was using them in a manner authorized by the invitation, whether express or implied. So far as Mrs. Ryerson's entry into the meat shop is concerned, she was undoubtedly within the protection of the rule. The question is whether she was entitled to that protection when she attempted to enter the door that was partially opened by Silvernail. The plaintiff's injury did not result from any defect in the doorway or in the staircase. So far as the case shows, there was no such defect. She was injured because she inferred that the doorway led to a closet, and thereupon attempted to enter, without taking observations herself, or making further inquiries. Was she justified in doing so? The case presents an instance of express invitation. In order to discover its extent, the words used by Silvernail are to be considered with reference solely to the plaintiff's expressed purpose and the act which accompanied his response. She said to Silvernail, "You must put her [the cat] in a closet, or she will run away again." He said, "Put her in here," and partially opened the door. This amounted to a declaration of her request that he should take the cat and put it in a closet. It did not even amount to a representation that the place indicated was a closet, in the ordinary acceptance of that term. By what he said and did he merely represented that the door opened into a place which, when the door was promptly closed again, would securely detain the cat. She had expressed no purpose to enter with the cat. On the contrary, she had notified him that the cat would run away on the slightest opportunity, which carried the inference that it was as important for the plaintiff to remain outside as it was for her to put the cat inside. The natural thing for her to do was to place the cat through the opening with her hands, and then permit Silvernail to quickly close the door, so as to detain the cat. If he had said, "This is a closet," she would have had a right to assume it to be such; but even so, in view of her expressed purpose and his reply, she would have had no right to infer an invitation to enter. If she went in with the cat, the way of exit required for her own withdrawal would necessarily be wider than would suffice for the cat's escape. The cat was confessedly more active than she. If she went in with the cat in her arms, it would, of course, be necessary for the door to be closed while she released the cat from her grasp. It is quite impossible to see how the plaintiff could then make her exit without permitting the cat to escape, especially if the closet was dark; and, in fact, she had not asked for a lighted one. It is sufficient to say that she had proposed no such roundabout program to Silvernail. The case shows that Silvernail formed a correct judgment of the exigencies of the problem, and that the plaintiff did not. He opened the cellar door barely wide enough to enable her to inject the cat according to the approved method, at the same time saying, "Put her in here." That was the extent of the invitation. The plaintiff exceeded the bounds of the invitation, and in so doing became a mere licensee. She was injured because she inferred, without warrant, that she might safely enter through the door, and because she thereupon did enter without taking observations herself or making further inquiries of Silvernail. The case rests upon its own peculiar circumstances; in view of which the disposition made of it by the trial court was correct.

The judgment should be affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY.

(.....N. J.....)

- *1. In an action of tort against a railroad company for negligently operating its locomotives in such manner as to cause them to emit smoke denser and more offensive in quality, and greater in volume, than reasonably required for the proper operation of the railroad, to the injury of plaintiff's property, situate near to the railroad, where the evidence shows such negligent operation, and substantial damage to the plaintiff's property, directly attributable thereto, it is erroneous for the trial court to limit the plaintiff's recovery to nominal damages, on the ground of inherent impossibility of determining how much of the damage was caused by smoke necessarily emitted in the careful operation of the railroad, and how much was caused by the smoke that was due to negligent operation.

2. In an action of tort, if it be impossible, in the nature of the case, to distinguish between the damage arising from the actionable injury and damage which has another origin, the jury should be left to make from the evidence the best estimate in their power, as reasonable men, and award to the plaintiff compensatory damages for the actionable injury.

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's property by smoke and noxious vapors generated in the operation of defendant's road. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Holt & Van Dike and Linton Satterthwait, for plaintiff in error:

In actions for personal injuries, juries are permitted to estimate the probable compensatory damages without any direct proof as to the amount. In actions for injuries to property, where, as in the case of personal injuries, the nature of the case makes exact proof impossible, the same rule, ex necessitate, obtains.

Castle*, 78 Cal. 454, 18 Pac. 872, 21 Pac. 11.

If a part only of the injury of the plaintiff was the result of the negligent and improper operation of its railroad by the defendant, the plaintiff was entitled to such damages as the jury should find from the evidence would fairly compensate her for the injury thus sustained.

Mr. Alan H. Strong for defendant in error.

Pitney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of tort. The gist of the plaintiff's declaration was that the defendant, in the operation of its railroad, negligently, unskilfully, and unnecessarily caused dense smoke, and noxious, penetrating, and discolored vapors, and offensive odors, in greater quantities than were required for the legitimate and proper use and operation of the railroad, to arise and ascend near to, through, and about the plaintiff's dwelling house, situate near to the railroad, thereby rendering the house uncomfortable and unhealthy and unfit for habitation, and injuring the furniture and other personal property of the plaintiff therein contained. At the trial, evidence was introduced tending to show that smoke in great quantities, emitted from the locomotives upon the defendant's railroad, was carried to and upon the plaintiff's premises, causing substantial damage to the dwelling house and its contents. The plaintiff also introduced evidence tending to show negligent firing of defendant's locomotives, and that thereby smoke was produced, denser, darker in color, and greater in volume than was reasonably required for the proper operation of the railroad, and that, by the exercise of due care and skill on the part of defendant's employees in firing the locomotives, much less smoke would have been produced. The contention on the part of defendant was that its locomotives were properly fired, and that such smoke as had been produced was no greater in quantity and no more offensive in quality than was necessarily produced in the proper and careful operation of the railroad. Upon the question of damages the trial judge charged the jury, in effect, that the burden rested upon the plaintiff to show the jury, by proof, how much of the damage she claimed to have suffered was the result of negligence on the part of the railroad company; that the evidence was in such shape that no twelve men could say how much of the damage was the result of carelessness in firing, and how much was necessarily incident to the careful operation of the railroad; that there was no way by which the jury could rightly apportion the damage, and to attempt to do so would be mere guesswork; and that, therefore, if the plaintiff was entitled to any damages at all, she could recover only nominal damages. To this part of the charge, exception was taken. The jury, by their verdict, found the defendant guilty of the negligence charged in the declaration, and assessed the plaintiff's damages at 6 cents. Judgment having been entered thereon, the plaintiff now assigns error upon that portion of the charge just referred to.

The bill of exceptions shows that the state of the proofs was, in fact, such that no twelve men could tell with accuracy how much of the damage was the result of carelessness in firing, and how much was necessarily incident to the careful operation of the road; and this for a reason that inhered in the nature of the case, and consequently was unavoidable by the plaintiff. The damage was caused by clouds of smoke proceeding from the defendant's locomotives; and those clouds were formed in part of smoke conceded to have been necessarily emitted in the careful operation of the locomotives, and in part of other smoke alleged by the plaintiff and found by the jury to have been unnecessarily emitted in the negligent operation of the locomotives. It was as impossible for the plaintiff to adduce evidence separating the unnecessary from the necessary damage, as for the defendant to split up each smoke cloud into two, label one, "Necessary," and the other, "Unnecessary," and send them separately to the plaintiff's premises. The question is whether, in a case where the proof shows that a railroad company has been guilty of a breach of duty in the respect indicated, and substantial damage has thereby accrued to an adjacent property owner, the right to recover substantial damages must be denied, by reason of the inherent impossibility of distinguishing between such damage as is necessarily incident to the careful operation of the road, and such as arises from the negligent and unskilful management of the road. It is obvious that, if the property owner must be confined to nominal damages in such a situation, it is the same, in effect, as to say that he is entitled to no recovery. In our opinion, this is not the law. The situation is one that is not very unusual in actions of tort. It many times happens that the damage arising from an actionable injury chargeable to the defendant is, in the nature of things, or from the circumstances of the cases, indistinguishable from other damage occurring at the same time, attributable to the acts of an independent tortfeasor or to natural causes. In such cases, since the injured party cannot supply the materials necessary to enable the jury to make an exact computation of the damages in suit, the approved practice is to leave it to the good sense of the jury, as reasonable men, to form from the evidence the best estimate that can be made under the circumstances, as a basis of compensatory damages for the actionable injury.

In Ogden v. Lucas, 48 Ill. 492, which was an action to recover damages for the destruction of corn by trespassing cattle, where it appeared that a part of the cattle were the property of others than the defendant, the court said: "In cases of this sort, entire accuracy is impossible. The jury had a right to consider from the evidence how much corn had been destroyed, and what proportion of the cattle in the field were turned in by the defendant, and thus arrive at as near an estimate of the damages as the nature of the case would permit." To the same effect is Harrison v. Adamson, 86 Iowa, 693, 53 N. W. 334. Washburn v. Gilman, 64 Me. 163, 18 Am. Rep. 246, was an action upon the case for a nuisance occasioned by casting refuse material out of the defendant's sawmill into a natural stream, whence it was carried by a spring freshet upon plaintiff's land. The court held the defendant liable for the damages arising from his own wrongful or negligent act, but not for those arising from the negligent acts of others, saying: "The difficulty may be great of accurately proportioning and assessing the damages done by the defendant, but that difficulty the defendant would have avoided had he taken the care that no occasion should arise requiring such assessment of damages." Phillips v. Phillips, 34 N. J. L. 208, was an action to recover damages for overflowing lands of the plaintiff, where it appeared that the flowing was due partly to the defendant's acts and partly to natural causes. The late Chief Justice Beasley charged the jury as follows: "It seems to be obvious that all water which flows on plaintiff's land must necessarily occasion damage to him. There is no reason in saying that, because his land would be overflowed in the natural condition of that water, that no harm is done in augmenting such inundations. The larger the augmentation of water, it would seem, the greater the injury would be by reason of such increase. It is a question for the good sense of the jury." Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Hoag, 90 Ill. 339, was an action against the railway company to recover damages for causing and permitting water to flow and escape from a water tank of defendant to and upon the land of the plaintiff. It appeared that the whole of the water which damaged the plaintiff did not come from the tank, but that, to some extent, it was surface water which flowed down from the hillside above. In view of this fact, the following instruction was requested by the defendant,—the refusal to give it being assigned for error,—viz: "If the jury cannot from the evidence determine what part or portion, if any, of damages was occasioned by the water escaping from the tank, then in no event can they find for the plaintiff more than nominal damages on account of damages he may have suffered from the flowing of the water." The court of review held this proposed instruction objectionable, as liable to mislead the jury to understand that, unless they could determine to a certainty the extent of damage from each of these sources, they should find only nominal damages for the plaintiff; the court declaring that if the jury could not separate and distinguish between the several amounts of the damage caused by the water from the tank and the surface water, respectively, they should have been left at liberty to estimate, as best they might, from the evidence, how much of the whole damage was occasioned by the water from the tank. See also Learned v. Castle, 78 Cal. 454, 18 Pac. 872, 21 Pac. 11; Priest v. Nichols, 116 Mass. 401; Mark v. Hudson River Bridge Co. 103 N. Y. 28, 8 N. E. 243. If the rule above indicated is proper to be adopted where the damage occasioned by the defendant's tortious acts is indistinguishable from that arising from the tortious acts of others, or that arising from natural causes, it follows, a fortiori, that the same rule is sufficiently favorable to a defendant from whose acts alone the entire loss to the plaintiff has arisen; it being found that a substantial part of the loss was occasioned by his tortious act, and conceded that the residue of the loss was attributable to some lawful act of the defendant, inseparable in its consequences from the tortious act. To say that the plaintiff must be denied a substantial recovery because of the impossibility of distinguishing between the consequences that were lawfully originated and those that were unlawfully imposed upon him is to say that in such circumstances the best approximation to justice attainable in a court of law is to require the injured party to bear the entire burden of loss. From the standpoint of natural justice, it would be better to permit the wrongdoer to bear the whole. But the rule above indicated does equal justice to both, so far as the nature of the case permits.

The judgment should be reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

NEW JERSEY SUPREME COURT.

STATE of New Jersey, Edward CLIFFORD, Prosecutor,

v.

William HELLER, Sheriff.

(63 N. J. L. 105.)

- *1. The legality of the proceedings at the trial of a prisoner convicted of a crime by a court of competent jurisdiction cannot be challenged or reviewed by habeas corpus.
2. On a writ of certiorari allowed with the writ of habeas corpus to bring up a warrant for the execution of the prisoner, purporting to be issued by the executive department of the state government under authority of the act of April 16, 1846, the court will adjudge whether such warrant is valid.
3. When the governor of the state resigns, the powers, duties, and emoluments of the office devolve, under the Constitution, upon the president of the senate, but he does not thereby become the governor of the state in the constitutional sense. The president of the senate retains his office of senator, and as president of the senate he exercises the powers and performs the duties of the executive department.
4. When he resigns his office as senator, he ceases to be president of the senate, and thereupon the powers, duties, and emoluments of the executive office devolve in like manner upon the speaker of the house of assembly.
5. The granting of a reprieve and the fixing of a day for the execution of a convicted criminal is by the common law a judicial power, and cannot be exercised by the governor, or person administering the government, except in so far as it is expressly permitted by the Constitution.
6. The Constitution bestows upon the executive department the power to reprieve, but limits the exercise of that power to a period of ninety days after conviction, which means ninety days after sentence in the court below. As an incident to this granted power, the executive department may direct the execution to be proceeded with within the ninety days, and in that event the execution takes place, not by force of the executive warrant, but in virtue of the judgment of the court.

7. After the lapse of the ninety days, the power of the executive department in this respect ceases.

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain petitioner's release from custody to which he was committed awaiting execution of a death sentence for murder. Petitioner remanded.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Warren Dixon and John P. Stockton for prosecutor.

Messrs. James S. Erwin and Samuel H. Grey, Attorney General, for the State.

Van Syckel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Edward Clifford was convicted of murder in the first degree in the court of oyer and terminer of the county of Hudson, and sentenced by the said court on the 15th day of September, 1898. The proceedings at the trial were subsequently taken to the court of errors and appeals for review, and by the judgment of that court the judgment of the oyer and terminer was in all respects affirmed. Thereupon the court of oyer and terminer ordered the said Clifford to be executed on the 16th day of February, 1898. On the 14th day of February, 1898, Foster M. Voorhees, president of the senate of New Jersey, under his hand and the great seal of the state of New Jersey, directed the sheriff of the county of Hudson to suspend the execution of said death sentence until the 16th day of March, 1898. Further proceedings were taken on behalf of Clifford in the Federal courts, by which the execution of sentence was stayed until November 25, 1898, when David O. Watkins, speaker of the house of assembly of New Jersey, under his hand and the great seal of the state, suspended the execution of said sentence until the 6th day of January, 1899, and ordered the said Clifford to be executed on that day. Clifford is now before this court on habeas corpus, and at his instance a writ of certiorari was allowed to bring before the court the proceedings upon which the state claims to rest the order of David O. Watkins, the validity of which is controverted in this case.

Our habeas corpus act provides that the following, among other, persons mentioned shall not be entitled to prosecute such writ: "Persons committed or detained by virtue of the final judgment or decree of any competent tribunal of civil or criminal jurisdiction or by virtue of any execution issued upon such judgment or decree, unless such judgment or decree be founded upon contract." It is clear, therefore, that the legality of the proceedings at the trial of Clifford cannot be challenged or reviewed by writ of habeas corpus; and, if the case before us presented no other question, it would be the duty of the court to dismiss the writ as improvidently granted. But the return to the certiorari, and the facts agreed upon, present a question of great importance, in which the validity of the judgment of our courts is in no wise involved. That question is whether David O. Watkins had the power to order the execution of Clifford. If the warrant issued by him was unauthorized, it is the province and the duty of this court to intervene for the purpose of preventing an unlawful execution of the person condemned.

The admitted facts controlling this controversy are as follows: On the 31st day of January, 1898, John W. Griggs, then governor of New Jersey, filed in the office of the secretary of state his resignation as governor, to take effect at the termination of that day. Foster M. Voorhees was then president of the senate of New Jersey, being a senator from the county of Union. He thereupon took the oath, diligently, faithfully, and to the best of his knowledge to administer the government of the state in conformity with the powers delegated to him; which oath was filed in the office of the secretary of state on the 1st of February, 1898. On the 18th of October, 1898, Foster M. Voorhees filed in the office of the secretary of state a paper writing, of which the following is a copy: "State of New Jersey, Executive Department. To the Secretary of State, and to the Governor or Person Administering the Government: I hereby resign my commission as a member of the senate from the county of Union. Foster M. Voorhees." David O. Watkins was then a member of the general assembly of the state of New Jersey from Gloucester county, and speaker of the house of assembly. On the 18th day of October, 1898, he filed in the office of the secretary of state an oath that he would diligently, faithfully, and to the best of his knowledge, administer the government of the state in conformity with the powers delegated to him. It is insisted on behalf of the prosecutor that when Foster M. Voorhees filed in the office of the secretary of state the oath before mentioned, he ceased to be a member of the senate, and became governor of the state for the term fixed by the Constitution until another governor should be elected; that his resignation of his seat in the senate was unnecessary, and could not in any wise affect the tenure of his office as governor. To support this contention the well-settled rule laid down by Chief Justice Kirkpatrick in State v. Parkhurst, 9 N. J. L. 446, Appx., is relied upon: "That, if a person holding an office be appointed to and accept another office incompatible therewith, such acceptance of the second is a virtual surrender of and vacates the first." The argument is that Foster M. Voorhees became governor of New Jersey, and ceased thereby to be senator without resigning the latter office; that his subsequent resignation of the senatorship did not operate as a resignation of his office as governor, or in any wise affect his right to hold said office, or his duty to execute its prescribed functions; that under the Constitution the office of governor could become again vacant only by the death, resignation, or removal of Foster M. Voorhees, and, as neither of those contingencies has occurred, there was no vacancy in the office of governor by which David O. Watkins could succeed to that office.

Assuming the premises of the prosecutor to be entirely sound, it seems to result, not only that the resignation of the senatorship by Foster M. Voorhees did not vacate the office of governor, but that the resignation of the senatorship was equivalent to a declaration that he resigned that office, and elected to retain the office of governor, which he did not resign. It is well settled, both in England and in this country, that title to an office cannot be challenged on habeas corpus, or in any other collateral proceeding. Where the official is in possession of the office, and is executing its powers under color of title, he will be regarded at least as a de facto officer, and as to the public his official acts will be efficacious. That rule, so absolutely essential to the stability of government and the protection of the governed, should be recognized in its full force. The case sub judice is peculiar and novel. The situation is this: If Foster M. Voorhees, as president of the senate, was transferred by force of the constitutional provision to the office of governor, thereby vacating his office of senator, he is still governor of New Jersey, in full possession of the powers of the office, and under obligation to perform its duties; and if he is governor de jure, in possession of the office, David O. Watkins cannot at the same time be governor de facto, and the warrant signed by him is without the slightest legal value. All that appears in the case before us is that Gov. Griggs resigned; that Foster M. Voorhees, president of the senate, took the oath before stated; that he subsequently resigned his office of senator; that David O. Watkins is speaker of the assembly, and that he took the oath set forth. No act appears on his part to show that he is governor de facto, except the oath and the signing of the death warrant. If Foster M. Voorhees was gov-error, and his resignation of the senatorship was not a vacation of his office as governor, he must still be governor, nothing appearing before us except his resignation as senator to show that he is not still acting and claiming to act as governor. We are constrained, therefore, to resort to an interpretation of the provisions of our state Constitution touching this subject, to determine whether David O. Watkins had the right, either de jure or de facto, to do the act which has given rise to this litigation.

The clause of the Constitution which provides for the vacancy in the office of governor is as follows: "In case of the death, resignation, or removal from office of the governor, the powers, duties, and emoluments of the office shall devolve upon the president of the senate, and in case of his death, resignation, or removal, then upon the speaker of the house of assembly, for the time being, until another governor shall be elected and qualified; but in such case another governor shall be chosen at the next election for members of the legislature, unless such death, resignation, or removal shall occur within thirty days immediately preceding such next election, in which case a governor shall be chosen at the second succeeding election for members of the legislature. When a vacancy happens, during the recess of the legislature, in any office which is to be filled by the governor and senate or by the legislature in joint meeting, the governor shall fill such vacancy and the commission shall expire at the end of the next session of the legislature unless a successor shall be sooner appointed; when a vacancy happens in the office of clerk or surrogate of any county, the governor shall fill such vacancy, and the commission shall expire when a successor is elected and qualified." Article 5, clause 12. In construing this clause of the Constitution it must be borne in mind that it was carefully drawn by learned jurists, who knew how to express with exactness and precision the purpose they had in view. The provision is that, in case of the resignation of the governor, the powers, duties, and emoluments of the office shall devolve upon the president of the senate, and not that the president of the senate shall thereby become governor, and hold the title and the office until another governor is elected. If the framers of the fundamental law had intended to transfer the president of the senate to the executive chair, and thereby to vacate his office of senator, it is reasonable to believe that they would have said so in no uncertain language. The language used is not ambiguous. It declares that the powers, duties, and emoluments of the office shall devolve on the president of the senate; it does not confer upon him the title of the office. The president of the senate exercises the powers of the governor; the president of the senate performs the duties of the governor; the president of the senate receives the emoluments of that office. He is still president of the senate, with the added duties required of the chief executive of the state imposed upon him. There is no language in the Constitution from which it can reasonably be inferred that his office of president of the senate was to be vacated. He retains his office of senator; and as president of the senate, and not as governor, he exercises the added powers and performs the superimposed duties. That such is not only the ordinary acceptance and the reasonable interpretation of the language employed, but also the intention of those who framed this clause, is evinced in other parts of the organic law. In clauses 9 and 10 of article 5 and clauses 2 and 3 of article 8 this language appears: "The governor or person administering the government." Why is this language so sedulously used throughout the Constitution? If the president of the senate becomes governor, and ceases to be senator, he is fitly and accurately described in all those clauses by the word "governor," and therefore the words "person administering the government" are not only unnecessary and superfluous, but misdescriptive. The words "person administering the government" were inserted advisedly to describe the president of the senate who might be called upon to administer the government, but who would not thereby become or be governor; and, in the absence of that language, would not be subject to the clauses referred to. Again, article 3 of the Constitution provides as follows: "The powers of the government shall be divided into three distinct departments,—the legislative, executive and judicial; and no person or persons belonging to or constituting one of these departments shall exercise any of the powers properly belonging to either of the others, except as herein expressly provided." What is the significance of the words in this clause "except as herein expressly provided?" What powers belonging to one department of government were there which it was expressly provided in the Constitution might be exercised by one of the other departments? The framers of this article said by this exception, in unmistakable language, there are some powers belonging to one department of the government which it is expressly provided in this Constitution shall be exercised by a person or persons belonging to one of the other departments. In the Constitution we find such a provision, and it is the only one in the Constitution except the power to relieve. That provision is the one before referred to in clause 12 of article 5, which provides that the president of the senate, or, in case of his death, resignation, or removal, the speaker of the house, shall exercise the powers of the executive department of the government in the contingency therein specified. It must, therefore, have been the understanding and intention of the Constitution makers that the executive powers to be exercised by a member of the legislative department were to be exercised in the capacity of a legislator, and that made the exception in article 3 a necessary provision.

But it is argued that the president of the senate is a judge of the court of impeachment, and may try himself if he is impeached, and pardon himself if convicted. This is clearly a misconception of the situation. As president of the senate he performs the duties of the chief executive, and any malfeasance in that respect is as much a violation of his duty as a senator and as president of the senate as malfeasance in his purely legislative action would be. If impeached, it would be as a senator, and not as governor. He would be tried by the senate, which is the trial court in all cases of impeachment. While there is no express provision in the Constitution that a member of the senate shall not sit as a judge on his own trial if impeached, he is nevertheless incompetent, and would be excluded. The principle that a man shall not be a judge in his own case is accepted universally by judicial tribunals. It is a rule of such fundamental character that it is deemed essential to the well-being of society, and underlies the organic law itself. If any doubt could arise upon this point, a reference to § 3 of article 6 of the Constitution should set it at rest. That section provides that all impeachments shall be tried by the senate, and that the members of the senate, when sitting for that purpose, shall each take an oath "truly and impartially to try and determine the charge in question according to evidence." It would be the sublimity of folly to attempt to bind a senator by such an oath when he was sitting in his own case. If the president of the senate was impeached and convicted, he would cease to be senator, and thereupon the powers of the executive would devolve upon the speaker of the house. The fact that the president of the senate exercises both legislative and executive functions in the view herein taken can have no significance in this discussion, when we advert to the fact that under the first state Constitution the governor was not only the chief executive, but he was also president of the legislative council, with a casting vote, and presiding judge of the highest court in the state. The powers of government were more wisely distributed by the Constitution of 1844, in which, by article 3, a member of one department could not exercise a power belonging to either of the others, except in the instances where the office of governor became vacant, and the power to reprieve was granted. If anything is needed to establish the correctness of this view, it is found in clause 13 of article 5, which reads as follows: "In case of the impeachment of the governor, his absence from the state or inability to discharge the duties of his office, the powers, duties, and emoluments of the office shall devolve upon the president of the senate; and in case of his death, resignation, or removal, then upon the speaker of the house of assembly for the time being, until the governor absent, or impeached, shall return or be acquitted, or until the disqualification or inability shall cease, or until a new governor be elected and qualified." In case of the absence of the governor from the state, precisely the same language is used as in clause 12 in relation to his resignation of the office, and it must necessarily receive the same interpretation. In case of his absence from the state, "the powers, duties, and emoluments of the office shall devolve upon the president of the senate" until the governor returns. Will it be seriously contended that, when the governor goes out of the state, the president of the senate becomes governor until the duly elected governor returns, and thereby vacates and loses his office as senator? That such an interpretation of this language would be adopted could not have been within the contemplation of the able men who incorporated it in this clause relating to a matter of supreme importance. If it is the true construction, then, when the senate was composed of ten members of one party and eleven of the other, the governor of the state, by the simple device of passing into an adjoining state, could have vacated the seat of one senator, and thus have deprived the opposing party of a majority in that branch of the legislature. In my judgment, the framers of the Constitution meant simply what they said,—that, in case the governor resigned, the president of the senate, as such, should have the powers and perform the duties of the office. Foster M. Voorhees did not become governor upon the resignation of Gov. Griggs. He still continued to be a senator, and president of the senate. He could not resign the office of governor, which he never held. When he resigned and vacated the office of senator, he ceased to be president of the senate, and could no longer exercise the functions pertaining to the executive department. Therefore, upon his resignation as senator, the powers, duties, and emoluments of the office devolved upon David O. Watkins, the speaker of the house of assembly. He is de jure the speaker of the house, and of right, as such speaker, exercises the executive powers. He is not governor, either de jure or de facto, in the constitutional sense of that term. The act of 1898 cannot, in any respect, affect this controversy.

The question, therefore, remains to be considered whether the issuing of the warrant for the execution of Clifford was a valid exercise by David O. Watkins of the powers committed to him as speaker of the house of assembly? By the common law, where the judgment was pronounced in theoyer and terminer, a precept for execution was issued to the sheriff in the name and under the hands and seals of the three commissioners before whom judgment was given; but the precepts by justices of the jail delivery need not have been otherwise than by a simple award upon the roll. In later times there was no more done, but, after judgment was entered, the judges subscribed a calendar in paper directing the several judgments of deliverance to the parties acquitted, or the execution of the parties condemned, of which the sheriff was required to take notice openly in court. 2 Hale, P. C. p. 409. It is also quite clear that by the common law the time and place of execution were not named in the sentence; it was left to the judgment and discretion of the sheriff. The execution of the prisoner was directed by the words "sus. per coll." written against his name in a calendar prepared for the purpose. Mr. Chitty says: "The practice at the present day at the assizes is as follows: When all the other public business of the court is terminated, the clerk of assize makes out in writing four lists of the prisoners with separate columns containing their crimes, verdicts, and sentences, and a blank column, in which the judge writes what is his pleasure respecting those capitally convicted as to be executed, respited, or transported. If the sheriff afterwards receives no special order from the judge, he executes the judgment of the law in the usual manner, according to the directions of his calendar." 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 781. The only instance of a warrant from the Crown was in the case of high treason, where a peer of the realm was tried before Parliament. Where all the rest of the judgment save the beheading was pardoned, the execution was to be under the great seal. 3 Co. Inst. p. 31; 2 Hale, P. C. pp. 409-412. In felonies we think it clear that the direction for the execution of the sentence was a judicial act, for these reasons: First, that the judgment of the court was a sufficient warrant; and, secondly, issues extraneous of those raised at the trial might be raised in suspension of the sentence, which required a judicial determination,—as, for instance, where the convict is a female, she may plead that she is quick with child; and, second, if an allegation be made that since the conviction the accused has become insane. In both of these cases, as well as others, there is to be a judicial investigation. 4 Bl. Com. 395. At common law, reprieve might be granted either by the King, under his power to pardon, or by the court; and every court which had power to award execution had power to grant a reprieve. This reprieve was simply a suspension of the sentence. In Re v. Harris, 1 Ld. Raym. 482, counsel urged "that in criminal causes, where execution is deferred, it cannot be awarded without bringing the prisoner to the bar, . . . to which Holt, Ch. J., agreed, and he cited Knightley's Case, who was indicted for high treason, . . . and, being arraigned at bar in the King's bench, confessed the indictment, and judgment of death was pronounced against him in Easter term, and execution was countermanded, so that Trinity term passed, and then in the long vacation they had a design to execute it, and upon that all the judges of England met to consider what could be done, and it was resolved by all that in regard a term had intervened without execution done it could not be awarded without bringing Knightley to the bar. And, per Holt, Ch. J., it would be the same thing if Trinity term had not passed, but only begun, so that Knightley was imprisoned until Michaelmas term, and in the meantime he obtained a pardon." In Sir Walter Raleigh's Case the question was whether a privy seal was sufficient for execution. It was resolved on a conference between all the judges that the prisoner ought to be brought to the court, and then demanded if he could say anything, etc., and that it was not a legal course that he should be commanded by a privy seal or great seal to be executed without being demanded what he hath to say, etc. Hutton, 21. If the governor can intervene and have execution by virtue of his warrant, the prisoner will be deprived of the right of a judicial determination of matters which in law are subjects of judicial cognizance. If the order which shall carry the judgment of the court into effect is one within judicial control,—as we deem it to be,—then the several constitutional provisions are to be considered. By the Constitution of 1776 the governor had no power to pardon or to grant reprieve. Whatever power there was in that respect was vested in the governor and council; that is the court of appeals.

Under the power to pardon at common law the power of the King to reprieve was included, and the power of reprieve was not vested in the governor, but in the governor and council. By the act of November 16, 1820, the governor, with the advice of his privy council, had power to suspend execution of the sentence of death until the rising of the next meeting of the governor and council. By the act of 1821, where such a reprieve was granted, and a pardon was not granted at the next meeting, it was made the duty of the governor and council to appoint a time for the execution of the criminal. Elmer's Digest, p. 118. By the Constitution of 1844 the executive, with the concurrence of the chancellor and of the six judges of the court of appeals, or a major part of them, may grant pardons after conviction (art. 5, clause 10); and by article 5, clause 9, the executive was given power to grant reprieve to extend until the expiration of a time not exceeding ninety days after conviction. By the act of April 16, 1846, it is provided that, where a reprieve is granted by the governor, the governor shall issue his warrant to the sheriff of the proper county, commanding him to execute the sentence at such time as shall therein be appointed and expressed. Revision, p. 290, § 123. Power to reprieve is limited to a postponement of the execution for ninety days after the conviction; that is, after the sentence in the court below. By article 3 of the Constitution of 1844, before set forth, the governor is prohibited from exercising any legislative or judicial power except as in said Constitution is expressly provided. The express provision of the Constitution on this subject, so far as concerns the executive, is that he shall have power to suspend the sentence of the court for a period not exceeding ninety days. The term "reprieve," as used both in the Constitution and in the statute, is merely the postponement of the sentence for a time. It does not and cannot defeat the ultimate execution of the judgment of the court; it merely delays it. In the exercise of the power to reprieve for ninety days, which is the constitutional limit of that power, the governor has, as an incident to that power, the right to say that at the expiration of that time the sheriff shall no longer be stayed, but shall proceed to execute the judgment of the court. The reprieve, to be in proper form, should fix a day not exceeding ninety days from the sentence, when it shall expire, and direct the execution to be proceeded with at the expiration of that time. The execution takes place then, not by order of the governor, but in virtue of the judgment of the court. The governor simply says: "The prisoner is adjudged to be executed on a certain day. I direct the execution to be postponed until a future day specified, and then the execution is to be proceeded with." In Ex parte Fleming, 60 Miss. 910, the court said: "The power to respite necessarily carries with it the power to fix another and later day for the execution of the death sentence, since the respite is nothing more than a suspension of the sentence until its own expiration. The subsequent execution takes place, not by virtue of a new sentence, but by reason of the expiration of the temporary suspension of the original sentence which was caused by the respite." Sterling v. Drake, 29 Ohio St. 457, 23 Am. Rep. 762, is to the like effect. If there was a doubt in respect to the proper procedure in this respect, the long continued practice of the executive department to make orders for the execution of sentences where there has been a reprieve will justify the construction that such orders may be issued, provided that the time for execution is not extended beyond the ninety days. That practice, commencing in 1853, has been pursued until the present time. The order certified into this court was made after the expiration of the ninety days, and is without any legal or constitutional warrant, and must be set aside. The order made in the case of Martin by Gov. Ludlow does not conflict with the views herein expressed. The reprieve and order were both within ninety days from the time of conviction, and, that time having elapsed, Martin was executed, not under the governor's warrant, but under an order made by the court of oyer and terminer.

The traverse of the sheriff's return to the writ of habeas corpus must be stricken out, and the prisoner remanded. Let rules be entered accordingly.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Frank H. PRESBY, Respt.,
v.
George G. BENJAMIN, Appt.

(169 N. Y. 377.)

A covenant in a lease against assigning or subletting is not violated by placing a care taker in possession during the tenant's absence.

(January 14, 1902.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for New York County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover rent. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kuzman & Frankenheimer and A. L. Gutman, for appellant:

The defendant had the right, under his lease, to occupy the flat by himself and his servants; he had the right to place his servant O'Brien in charge of his flat, during his absence, to take care of the flat and its contents as care taker.

NOTE.—As to assignment of lease generally, see, in this series, Chicago Attachment Co. v. Davis Sewing Mach. Co. (Ill.) 15 L. R. A. 754, and note.

No restriction whatever upon the tenant's right to employ servants is contained in the lease, and none can be injected into it by implication.

Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Pennsylvania Coal Co. 8 Wall. 276, 19 L. ed. 349; Bruce v. Fulton Nat. Bank, 79 N. Y. 161, 35 Am. Rep. 505; Zorkowski v. Astor, 156 N. Y. 393, 50 N. E. 983.

In taking care of the contents of the flat O'Brien was performing a service, which the landlord's express exemption under the lease from liability for loss or damage to the defendant's effects rendered necessary. In order to discharge these services properly, occupation of the flat by O'Brien was not only necessary, but absolutely essential. His occupancy of the flat would, therefore, be that of a servant, and not that of a tenant.

Messrs. Young, VerPlanck, & Prince, for respondent: ,

Mr. Benjamin's attempt to install another family, with their furniture, in the apartment he had vacated, if successful, would have been in violation of the lease.

The objections against defendant's attempted act are not obviated by calling O'Brien a servant or a care taker, for, even if such, he was not ipso facto entitled to be installed with his family and furniture in the vacated apartment.

Defendant's own testimony shows that the relation between himself and O'Brien was that of landlord and tenant.

Cullen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action was to recover the rent reserved in the lease of an apartment in the city of New York. The defense was eviction. The claim of the defendant was that, upon leaving his apartment before the expiration of the demised term, he placed the porter of his store, with his wife, in the apartment, as his servants, to take care of the apartment on his behalf during his absence; that the plaintiff refused to allow the defendant's servants to enter or occupy the apartment; and that thereupon he surrendered and abandoned the premises to the landlord. The tenant of the apartment has necessarily, as appurtenant thereto, an easement of way in the common halls or passages which afford access to the apartment from the street. The unjustifiable refusal of the landlord to suffer the tenant to exercise this right of access would amount to an eviction, for it would destroy the enjoyment of the demised premises. The controverted question in the case is whether the action of the landlord was justified. He claims that the attempt of the defendant to place his porter in occupation of the premises was in violation of the terms of the lease, and that he was entitled to prevent it. By virtue of the right to exclusive occupation which a tenant acquires by his lease, he "becomes entitled to use the premises in the same manner as the owner might have done, except that he must do no act to the injury of the inheritance." Taylor, Land. & T. § 172. This right may be limited or qualified by the terms of the lease, but it is not necessary for the tenant to show any particular provision of the instrument to justify his unlimited right of use and occupation, but the landlord who denies it must point out the covenant which expressly restricts the tenant's rights. The lease provides that the apartment shall be used as a private dwelling only. The defendant's action in no way tended to violate this covenant. The lease contained the further covenant that the lessee would not assign or sublet the premises, or any part thereof, without the consent of the landlord, under penalty of forfeiture. It is first to be observed that "such covenants are restraints which courts do not favor. They are construed with the utmost jealousy, and very easy modes have always been countenanced for defeating them." Riggs v. Purcell, 66 N. Y. 193; Taylor, Land. & T. § 403; McAdams, Land. & T. § 141. Thus a covenant not to assign does not prevent an underletting (Jackson ex dem. Stevens v. Silvernail, 15 Johns. 278), and a covenant not to underlet the premises is not broken by a sublease of a part of the premises (Roosevelt v. Hopkins, 33 N. Y. 81). In this case it is not at all necessary to go to the extent of the authorities cited. It is clear that, even under a liberal construction of the covenant, to constitute a violation of this lease the defendant must have attempted to put in possession of the premises a new tenant, not merely a new occupant. To be a tenant a person must have some estate, be it ever so little, such as that of a tenant at will or on sufferance. A person may be in occupation of real property simply as a servant or licensee of his master. In that case the possession is not changed; it is always in the master. Kerrains v. People, 60 N. Y. 221, 19 Am. Rep. 158. Therefore, if the defendant sought to place his porter in occupation of the premises as care taker or as servant, he was entirely within his rights. His testimony to this effect was not conclusive. There were circumstances from which the jury might have inferred that the suggestion of a care taker was a subterfuge, and that the real intent was to make the porter a tenant of the premises. But in this respect the evidence presented a question of fact for the jury to pass upon. The court could not determine it as a matter of law. Indeed, the learned trial court seems not to have passed on this question, but to have disposed of the case on the ground that placing the porter and his wife in his apartment, even as the defendant's servants, was a violation of the lease. This view, as we have said, was erroneous.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered; costs to abide the event.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Erie County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a life insurance policy. Reversed.

Statement by Vann, J.:

This action was brought to recover the sum of $1,000, alleged to be due on a policy of insurance issued by the defendant to the plaintiff, as beneficiary, upon the life of her husband, George H. Sternaman. The policy recites that the promise to insure was made in consideration of the statements contained in the application, all of which are referred to as warranties, and made a part of the contract. The application consists of two parts, A and B. Part A, entitled, "Application to the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company," consists of questions relating to the age, occupation, family history, etc., of Mr. Sternaman, all of which were truthfully answered. At the close of these questions and answers there appeared the following: "It is hereby declared, agreed, and warranted by the undersigned that the answers and statements contained in the foregoing application, and those made to the medical examiner, as recorded in parts A and B of this sheet, together with this declaration, shall be the basis and become part of the contract of insurance with the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company; that they are full and true and are correctly recorded, and that no information or statement not contained in this application and in the statements made to the medical examiner, received or acquired at any time by any person, shall be binding upon the company, or shall modify or alter the declaration and warranties made therein; that the persons who wrote in the answers and statements were and are our agents for the purpose, and not the agents of the company, and that the company is not to be taken to be responsible for its preparation, or for anything contained therein or omitted therefrom; that any false, incorrect, or untrue answer, any suppression or concealment of facts in any of the answers, any violation of the covenants, conditions, or restrictions of the policy, any neglect to pay the premium on or before the date it becomes due, shall render the policy null and void, and forfeit all payments made thereon." Part A, dated April 25, 1896, was signed by both Mr. and Mrs. Sternaman, and witnessed by one Godson. Part B, entitled, "Statements Made to the Medical Examiner," consists of more than 100 questions in fine print, and the answers thereto, written in a blank space so contracted as to admit of an affirmative or negative answer, with little or no opportunity for explanation. They relate to the health, past and present, of the applicant, the diseases he had been afflicted with, and the physicians he had consulted. Among them were the following: "Have you ever had loss of consciousness? No. Any personal injury? No. Name and residence of your usual medical attendant? Dr. Frost, Plymouth avenue. When and for what have his services been required? For la grippe. Have you consulted any other physician, and, if so, when, and for what? No." Part B closed as follows: "I hereby declare that the application to the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company on the reverse of this sheet for an insurance on my life was signed by me, and that I renew and confirm my agreements therein as to the answers given above to the medical examiner, and I hereby declare that said answers are correctly recorded." Part B, dated April 27, 1896, was signed by Mr. Sternaman only, and was witnessed by Dr. Langley, the medical examiner.

Upon the trial the defendant introduced evidence tending to show that some of the answers above quoted, made to the medical examiner, were not literally true. The plaintiff then proved that the application "was brought to the house of the insured by Dr. Langley, who was one of the defendant's medical examiners and was designated and paid by the defendant; that the questions were asked of the deceased, and the answers thereto in the application were filled in by the doctor in his own handwriting; that the doctor took the application away with him after it had been signed by the plaintiff and said insured; and that the application has been in the possession of the defendant ever since. The plaintiff was present and heard the conversation between the doctor and the deceased at the time the application was filled in and signed." The plaintiff was then sworn as a witness in her own behalf, but was not allowed to testify to the answers in fact made by her husband to the questions put to him by the medical examiner. The plaintiff's counsel offered to prove by her "that in this interview, at this time and place, George H. Sternaman, the insured, told Dr. Langley, the medical examiner of the defendant, that he had suffered from malaria, and was attended by Dr. McFadden, of Buffalo, or, rather, that he went to Dr. McFadden's on several occasions, for malaria, to consult him, but that he was not at any time on that account laid up from work; and that he also doctored with Dr. McFadden, by going to his office, for sore eyes; and also that at the time the beneficiary, the plaintiff here, was sick, and the insured did have sore throat or tonsillitis, and that Dr. Tanner did attend him on three or more occasions at that time, but that he was not seriously ill; and that the deceased also stated to Dr. Langley that on one occasion he had been hurt in a fall from his bicycle, in that the skin from the palm of his hand had been injured, and that he had been attended by Dr. Staples, mentioned in the proofs of loss, for that injury to the hand; and that he had, during the period of his life principally preceding his marriage, had peculiar spells, of which he did not know the name, in which he had partly lost consciousness, and that they were occasioned by any disappointment or reverse or mental pain that he suffered; and that his wife had consulted with Dr. Frost about them at one time, and that Dr. Frost had said that they were not of very much importance; and that one of these different physicians whom he had gone to had said that he had catarrh of the stomach, and that Dr. Langley thereupon examined him and questioned him in regard to catarrh of the stomach, and said that he did not have it; and that, in regard to the other matters (being the malaria, the injury to the hand, and the tonsillitis), Dr. Langley said that they were not of enough importance to insert them in the medical examination, and that these consultations with other physicians were not of so serious a character as to require mentioning; and, further, that all particulars of every consultation with every physician, and every injury to his health, or disease, were fully disclosed to Dr. Langley in this interview, prior to his filling out both parts of the application, and Dr. Langley said that they were none of them of sufficient importance to warrant being inserted; and that Dr. Langley thereupon filled out the application and it was signed. The plaintiff's attorney offered to make proof of each of these facts separately, as well as a whole." This testimony was excluded upon the objection of the defendant that it was incompetent, immaterial, and in violation of the contract, and that the plaintiff could not by parol vary the terms of the application and contract. Exceptions were taken to the rulings which excluded this evidence.

The insured died of multiple neuritis,—a disease which apparently had no connection with the answers alleged to be false, 157 L. R. A.

though this did not expressly appear. Da Costa, Medical Diagnosis, 128; Lippencott, Medical Dict. 673.

The jury, as directed by the trial judge, rendered a verdict for the defendant; and, the judgment entered thereon having been affirmed by the appellate division (one of the justices dissenting, and another not voting), the plaintiff appealed to this court.

Messrs. Duckwitz, Thayer, & Jackson, for appellant:

This is a case of the defendant's medical examiner intentionally and in good faith omitting certain trivial ailments and the consultations therefor, fully disclosed to him by the insured, but which he considered too unimportant to be inserted.

The defendant required the substantial truth to be recorded in a quarter of an inch of space, where literal truth would require a foot of space, and it sent its medical examiner to the insured to find out and put down the substantial truth.

James v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. 40 App. Div. 465, 58 N. Y. Supp. 244.

Neither the insured nor the defendant could have had the intention of making its medical examiner the insured's agent in this transaction, any more than they could have had the intention of making its president agent for the insured under the same circumstances.

There is no clause in the warranty which makes the medical examiner, if he be the one that inserts the answers, the agent for the insured, so as to bind the insured by his wrong interpretation of what the questions mean and the substantially correct answers thereto.

O'Farrell v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 22 App. Div. 500, 48 N. Y. Supp. 199; Bernard v. United L. Ins. Assn. 14 App. Div. 142, 43 N. Y. Supp. 527.

The defendant cannot transform an agent representing it into an agent for the insured, so as to make the insured responsible for his mistakes.

Mr. Seward A. Simons, for respondent:

There is abundant authority to sustain the decision of the trial court.

To reverse this judgment, and deny the defendant's right to contract as it has fairly contracted with the plaintiff and the intestate, is to do violence to the universally accepted rule that a principal may limit an agent's powers by notice to all parties dealing with him.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The decision of this appeal turns substantially upon the following question: When an applicant for life insurance makes truthful answers to all questions asked by the medical examiner, who fails to record them as given, and omits an important part, stating that it is unimportant, can the beneficiary show the answers actually given, in order to defeat a forfeiture claimed by the insurer on account of the falsity of the answers as recorded, even if it was agreed in the application that the medical examiner, employed and paid by the insurer only, should not be its agent, but solely the agent of the insured?

The power to contract is not unlimited. While, as a general rule, there is the utmost freedom of action in this regard, some restrictions are placed upon the right by legislation, by public policy, and by the nature of things. Parties cannot make a binding contract in violation of law or of public policy. They cannot in the same instrument agree that a thing exists, and that it does not exist, or provide that one is the agent of the other, and at the same time, and with reference to the same subject, that there is no relation of agency between them. They cannot bind themselves by agreeing that a loan in fact void for usury is not usurious, or that a copartnership which actually exists between them does not exist. They cannot by agreement change the laws of nature or of logic, or create relations, physical, legal, or moral, which cannot be created. In other words, they cannot accomplish the impossible by contract. The parties to the policy in question could agree that the person who filled out part A of the application was the agent of the insured, and not of the company. There is a difference in the nature of the work of filling out the blank to be signed by the insured, and that of filling out the blank furnished for the use of the medical examiner. The former is the work of the insured, and may be done as well by one person as by another. He may do it himself, or appoint an agent to do it for him. It is quite different, however, with the work of the medical examiner, because that requires professional skill and experience and the insurer permits it to be done only by its own appointee. The insured can neither do that work himself, nor appoint a physician to do it, because the insurer very properly insists upon making the selection itself. The medical examiner was selected, employed, and paid by the company. The insured had nothing to do with him, except to submit to an examination by him, as the expert of the company, and to answer the questions asked by him in behalf of the company. This he was forced to do in order to procure insurance; for the company required him to undergo a medical examination by an examiner selected and instructed by itself, before it would act upon his application for a policy. He could neither refuse to be examined, nor select the examiner, and he was not responsible if the latter was negligent or unfit for the duty assigned to him. He could not direct or control him, but the company could and did; for it required him to make the examination, fill out part B of the application blank, and report the facts, with his opinion. The insured made no contract with the examiner, and was under no obligation to pay him for his services. The company, however, made a contract with him to do certain work for it, and agreed to pay him for the work when done. As between the examiner and the insured, the relation of principal and agent did not exist, while, as between the examiner and the company, that relation did exist by operation of law; yet it is claimed that, as between the insured and the company, the examiner was the agent of the former only, because he had so agreed, not with the examiner, but with the company itself. Under the circumstances, an agreement that the physician was the agent of the insured was like an agreement that the company or its president was his agent. It was in contradiction of every act of the parties and of every fact known to either. The law, when applied to the facts, made the physician the agent of the company, and not of the insured; and can it be held that, as the insured agreed that the physician was his agent, he became such in spite of the law and the facts? This is not a case of agency of one party for one purpose, and of another party for a different purpose; for the physician was employed for a single purpose only, and that was to make a physical examination of the insured, ask him the questions furnished by the company, record his answers, and report the result. They were not the questions of the insured, put to himself, to elicit facts for his use. He knew the facts. He did not need to question himself to find out what he knew, nor to employ an agent for that purpose. The questions were those of the company, carefully prepared for it by skilful hands, and furnished to its medical examiner to be asked, so that it could learn what the insured knew about himself. It needed the facts for its use, and what was done by its own examiner to get the facts and report them to the company was its work, done for its benefit and in the course of its business. The answers were not volunteered, but were given in response to questions asked by the company, as much as if, impersonated, it had actually asked them as an individual. Whatever it told Dr. Langley to do for it, in the view of the law, it did itself. Qui facit per alium, facit per se. It appointed Dr. Langley its agent for the purpose named, and he derived all his authority to act from the company, which could regulate his conduct by its rules, and could provide for such security to protect its interests from the consequences of his neglect or default as it saw fit. Can parties agree that facts which the law declares establish a certain relation, not only do not establish that relation, but establish directly the opposite? Can A appoint B his agent for a definite purpose, and then agree with C that B is not the agent of A, but is the agent of C for that purpose; there being no agreement whatever between B and C?

An agency is created by contract, express or implied. It "is a legal relation . . . by virtue of which one party—the agent—is employed and authorized to represent and act for the other—the principal—in business dealings with third persons. The distinguishing features of the agent are his representative character and his derivative authority." Mechem, Agency, § 1; Story, Agency, § 3. "To constitute agency there must be consent both of principal and of agent." Wharton, Agency, § 1. What was the contract between the company and the examiner? The defendant, being a corporation, could act only through agents. Having some work to do in the form of a medical examination, it requested Dr. Langley to do it. It created the relation of agency between him and itself by employing him, paying him, etc. It alone could discharge him, and to it alone was he responsible for disobedience or negligence. It could control his conduct by any reasonable instructions, and hold him liable if he violated them. It prescribed certain questions that he should ask, and required him to take down the answers in a blank prepared by itself. It could sue him if he did not do it properly, and he could sue the company if it did not pay him for doing it. Thus we have an agency between the company and the examiner established by mutual agreement, with the right on the one hand to instruct, to discharge, and to hold liable for default, and on the other to compel payment for services rendered. Hence what the examiner did in the course of his employment the company did, and what he knew from discovery while acting for it the company knew. What was the contract between the insured and the examiner? None whatever. The insured did not employ the examiner, and the examiner did not agree to work for him. Neither was under any legal obligation or liability to the other. The insured could not instruct the doctor, nor discharge him, nor sue him for negligence, and the doctor could not sue the insured for compensation. The relation of principal and agent did not exist between them, either by virtue of any contract or by operation of law. What was the contract between the 57 L. R. A.

insured and the insurer? With the relations above described as existing between the insurer and the examiner in full force, and in the absence of any legal relation between the examiner and the insured, an attempt was made by the insurer, by an agreement imposed upon the insured, to subvert the relation of its own examiner to itself, and establish a relation between him and the insured, without the consent of either given to the other. There was no tripartite contract. While the contract between the doctor and the company was still in existence, the latter agreed with a third party only that that contract did not in fact exist between the two parties who made it, but did exist between two parties who did not make it. This was not possible by any form of words, any more than to make black white, or truth falsehood. We think that the medical examiner was the agent of the defendant in making the examination of the insured, recording his answers, and reporting them to the company.

Sound public policy prohibits the company from stipulating for immunity from the consequences of its own negligence, or, what is the same thing, the negligence of its agent. Rathbone v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 140 N. Y. 48, 35 N. E. 418. The manner of conducting the examination was, of necessity, intrusted to the judgment of the medical examiner to a great extent. His judgment might influence him to take down the answers in a general or in a particular way. In exercising his judgment he determined that certain answers were too trivial to be recorded. In making that determination he was not acting for the insured, but for the company; for it had furnished him with a blank, and had invested him with power to take down the answers, and hence with power to decide how they should be taken down. If he was negligent or failed to do his duty in this regard, the company could not, by an agreement made in advance, cast the burden upon the insured, who did not select or employ him. His negligence was its own negligence, and it could not by contract make it the negligence of the insured, or relieve itself from the legal consequences thereof.

But it is insisted the insured warranted that the answers were true, and that they were correctly recorded. When the company issued the policy, however, it knew, through its medical examiner, that the answers as recorded were not literally true; that the answers as given were not correctly recorded; and that this occurred through no fault of the insured. It could not take the money of the insured while he lived, and, when he was dead, claim a forfeiture on account of what it knew at the time it made the contract of insurance, for that would be a fraud. Van Schoick v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 68 N. Y. 434; O'Brien v. Home Benefit Society, 117 N. Y. 310, 22 N. E. 954; Kenyon v. Knights Templar & M. Mut. Aid Assn. 122 N. Y. 247, 25 N. E. 299.

The insured also agreed that "no information or statement not contained in this application and in the statements made to the medical examiner, received or acquired at any time by any person, shall be binding upon the company, or shall modify or alter the declarations and warranties made therein." The facts sought to be proved were contained in the oral statements made to the medical examiner, but, assuming that recorded statements only were meant, the result would be an agreement that the company might perpetuate a fraud upon the insured by issuing a policy and accepting premiums thereon, knowing all the time that the contract was void, or voidable at its election. The law does not permit this; for it declares that the company is estopped from taking advantage of such a contract, because it would be against equity and opposed to public policy. We adopt, as expressing our own views upon the subject, the following language used by the Supreme Court of the United States in a case somewhat analogous: "If, however, we suppose the party making the insurance to have been an individual, and to have been present when the application was signed, and soliciting the assured to make the contract of insurance, and that the insurer himself wrote out all these representations, and was told by the plaintiff and his wife that they knew nothing at all of this particular subject of inquiry, and that they refused to make any statement about it, and yet, knowing all this, wrote the representation to suit himself, it is equally clear that for the insurer to insist that the policy is void because it contains this statement would be an act of bad faith and of the grossest injustice and dishonesty. And the reason for this is that the representation was not the statement of the plaintiff, and that the defendant knew it was not when he made the contract, and that it was made by the defendant, who procured the plaintiff's signature thereto. It is in precisely such cases as this that courts of law in modern times have introduced the doctrine of equitable estoppels, or, as it is sometimes called, estoppels in pais. . . . Indeed, the doctrine is so well understood and so often enforced that if, in the transaction we are now considering, Ball, the insurance agent who made out the application, had been in fact the underwriter of the policy, no one would doubt its applicability to the present case. Yet the proposition admits of as little doubt that if Ball was the agent of the insurance company, and not of the plaintiff, in what he did in filling up the application, the company must be held to stand just as he would if he were the principal. . . . This principle does not admit oral testimony to vary or contradict that which is in writing, but it goes upon the idea that the writing offered in evidence was not the instrument of the party whose name is signed to it; that it was procured under such circumstances by the other side as estops that side from using it or relying on its contents; not that it may be contradicted by oral testimony, but that it may be shown by such testimony that it cannot be lawfully used against the party whose name is signed to it." Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, 13 Wall. 222, 20 L. ed. 617.

We think it is established by the weight of authority in this state that the medical examiner is the agent of the insurer in making the examination, taking down the answers, and reporting them to the company; that his knowledge thus acquired, his interpretation of the answers given, and his errors in recording them, are the knowledge, interpretation, and errors of the company itself, which is estopped from taking advantage of what it thus knew and what it had thus done when it issued the policy and accepted the premiums. O'Farrell v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 22 App. Div. 495, 48 N. Y. Supp. 199, 44 App. Div. 554, 60 N. Y. Supp. 945, 168 N. Y. 592, 60 N. E. 1117; O'Brien v. Home Benefit Society, 117 N. Y. 310, 318, 22 N. E. 054; Grattan v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 274, 44 Am. Rep. 372; Grattan v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 80 N. Y. 281, 36 Am. Rep. 617; Flynn v. Equitable L. Ins. Co. 78 N. Y. 568, 34 Am. Rep. 561; Whited v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 76 N. Y. 415, 32 Am. Rep. 330; Sprague v. Holland Purchase Ins. Co. 69 N. Y. 128.

The earlier cases of Rohrbach v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 62 N. Y. 47, 20 Am. Rep. 451, and Alexander v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 66 N. Y. 464, 23 Am. Rep. 76, involved the authority of a fire insurance broker or solicitor only, and were distinguished in Whited v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 76 N. Y. 419, 420, where the court said: "If the procurer of the insurance is to be deemed the agent of the insured, and Harmon is to be deemed such procurer, he may not be taken into the service of the insurer as its agent also; or, if he is so taken, the insurer must be bound by his acts and words when he stands in its place and moves and speaks as one having authority from it, and pro hac vice, at least, he does then rightfully put off his agency for the insured, and put on that for the insurer." In Allen v. German American Ins. Co. 123 N. Y. 6, 25 N. E. 309, the intermediary was also a mere broker, and not the agent of the company, as distinctly appears on page 15, 123 N. Y., and page 310, 25 N. E., where the court said: "So far as it appears. Noble had no relations whatever with the defendant, other than that he forwarded this paper writing which contained statements of the amount of insurance proposed for, and of the privileges desired. He certainly appears to have been nothing more than an insurance broker, soliciting insurance business; and when, upon the acceptance of the risk, he received back a policy of the company for the plaintiff, his sole office was simply to deliver it for the company, and to collect the premium. That is certainly not enough to constitute him an agent for the company, with authority to bind it retroactively or presently in transactions relating to the insurance. Circumstances are wholly wanting from which we may presume the authority of an agent." In the earlier Grattan Case the medical examiner was instructed by the defendant to report the answers to the questions in the certificate in his own handwriting, but he failed to report one of the answers as given by the applicant. In an action on the policy the falsity of the answer as recorded was insisted upon as a defense, although the answer as given was absolutely true. The court, referring to the medical examiner, said: "He was, as medical examiner, charged with certain duties by the defendant, and was acting in concert with the soliciting agent of the company. On the part of the life insured was entire good faith and truthfulness, and there is no reason to suspect any intentional unfairness on the part of the examiner. The omission was inadvertent. Is the company thereby released from its obligation? Many decisions in this court show that it is not. Mowry v. Rosendale, 74 N. Y. 360, and cases there cited. Within the principles therein recognized as well established, the erroneous answers must be taken as the declaration of the defendant, and, in any controversy depending upon it, must, between the parties, be taken to be true. In this case the physician was not the agent to solicit insurance, but he had an act to perform in regard to it as the agent of the company. His written instructions were to write out the answers. In this instance he failed to do it correctly. The principle upon which it has been held that the company, and not the insured, is responsible for the error of the soliciting agent, is equally applicable here. This question has been repeatedly considered by this court, and in the recent case of Flynn v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 9 N. Y. Week. Dig. 324, 78 N. Y. 568, 34 Am. Rep. 561, was again before us. The point presented was similar to the one now under review. The decision was in conformity with the views above expressed, and the doctrine referred to must be deemed settled." The O'Farrell Case was strikingly like the one before us, so far as the point now involved is concerned. In that case the insured agreed that his application was "made, prepared, and written" by himself, "or by his own proper agent," and that the company was "not to be taken to be responsible for its preparation, or for anything contained therein or omitted therefrom." He warranted that the answers made to the questions in both parts of the application, including that provided for the use of the medical examiner, were "strictly correct and wholly true;" that they should "form the basis and become part of the contract of insurance;" and that "any untrue answers" should "render the policy null and void." The policy itself referred to the application, and declared that the statements therein contained were warranties, and a part of the contract. Among the printed questions to be put by the medical examiner to the insured was the following: "Did any of the parents, grandparents, brothers, or sisters of the life proposed ever have consumption or any pulmonary or scrofulous diseases?" To this question he answered that he did not know, but the physician recorded the answer as "No." A recovery, at first denied, was finally had upon the policy, and it was sustained in both appellate courts. We divided in judgment and filed no opinion, but the following extract from the opinion of the supreme court upon the last appeal suggests the view that finally prevailed: "If it be accepted as a fact that the insured made answer to this question by stating that he did not know, then such fact became one known to the company, as it was known to its agent; and, if it thereafter chose to deliver the policy and accept the payment of premiums thereon, it became bound according to the tenor of its terms." In that case, as an examination of the appeal book on the files of this court shows, the answer, as made to the medical examiner by the insured, was received upon the trial, notwithstanding the strenuous objections of the defendant, and without that evidence there could have been no recovery on the policy. The affirmance of the judgment by this court necessarily involved an adjudication that such evidence was properly received.

Upon the trial of the case in hand, the defendant's objection to similar evidence on similar grounds was sustained, but both upon principle and authority we think it should have been received.

This conclusion requires a reversal of the judgment and the award of a new trial, with costs to abide the event.

O'Brien, Bartlett, Haight, and Martin, JJ., concur.

Parher, Ch. J., dissenting:

The decision about to be made is an unusually interesting one, because it introduces a new feature into the law of contracts, by which persons of sound and open minds and honest purposes are cut off in one direction from freedom of contract, in that they may not agree that an intermediary shall, for all purposes of the contract, be deemed the agent of one of the parties, if some court be of the opinion that he was the agent of the other; and this is to be held notwithstanding this court, in Allen v. German American Ins. Co. 123 N. Y. 6, 13, 25 N. E. 309, 310, in speaking of a similar provision in a contract of insurance, said: "Parties may insert any provisions they choose in contracts, provided they violate none of the rules of law, and they should all be given their appropriate and intended effect." The underlying reason prompting this decision received both consideration and condemnation in Maier v. Fidelity Mut. Life Assn. 24 C. C. A. 239, 47 U. S. App. 322, 78 Fed. 566, by Mr. Justice Harlan, writing for the circuit court of appeals of the sixth circuit; his associates concurring. In that case an application blank was erroneously filled up by an agent of defendant, for whose neglect or wrong plaintiff contended the defendant should not be advantaged, and the court said: "But here the assured was distinctly notified by the application that he was to be held as warranting the truth of his statements, 'by whomsoever written.' Such was the contract between the parties, and there is no reason in law or in public policy why its terms should not be respected and enforced in an action on the written contract. It is the impression with some that the courts may, in their discretion, relieve parties from the obligation of their contracts whenever it can be seen that they have acted heedlessly or carelessly in making them. But it is too often forgotten that, in giving relief under such circumstances to one party, the courts make and enforce a contract which the other party did not make or intend to make."

In the case at bar the defendant proved a breach of warranty which forfeited the policy. The facts thus warranted are found in that part of the application signed by the medical examiner; and the contention of the plaintiff is that Dr. Langley, the medical examiner, was the agent of the defendant, and hence it may be shown that the insured communicated to him certain facts about his life which the doctor did not write down, and which were in conflict with those written down, and that this may be done notwithstanding the application, which forms part of the contract, contains this provision: "It is hereby declared, agreed, and warranted by the undersigned that the answer and statements contained in the foregoing application, and those made to the medical examiner, as recorded in parts A and B of this sheet, together with this declaration, shall be the basis and become part of this contract of insurance with the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company; that they are full and true and are correctly recorded, and no information not contained in this application and in the statements made to the medical examiner (A and B, respectively), received or acquired at any time by any person, shall be binding upon the company, or shall modify or alter the declaration and warranties made therein; that the persons who wrote in the answers and statements were and are our agents for the purpose, and not the agents of the company, and that the company is not to be taken to be responsible for its preparation, or for anything contained therein or omitted therefrom; that any false, incorrect, or untrue answer, any suppression or concealment of facts in any of the answers, any violation of the covenants, conditions, or restrictions of the policy, any neglect to pay the premium on or before the day it becomes due, shall render the policy null and void and forfeit all payments made thereunder." At the close of the statements of the medical examiner, which are to be found in Exhibit B, is the following: "I hereby declare that the application to the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, on the reverse of this sheet, for an insurance on my life, was signed by me, and that I renew and confirm my agreement therein as to the answers given above to the medical examiner, and I hereby declare that said answers are correctly recorded." This was followed by the signature of the applicant. It appears, therefore, by the terms of the contract, that the insured declared that the medical examiner had correctly recorded the answers given to the questions; and it would seem that in the absence of fraud, of which there is no pretense in this case, the insured would be bound by the answers written out by the medical examiner, although he were in fact the defendant's agent, and there was no agreement on the part of the insured and the company that the physician should, for the purposes of the contract, be deemed the agent of the insured. Now, notwithstanding his agreement renewed and confirmed the answers as written out by the medical examiner, those answers were in fact untrue in important particulars,—so important that it is quite likely that, if the questions had been answered truly, a policy would not have been issued. But that fact, if it be such, is one of no legal importance in the disposition of this case. By the terms of the application it was agreed that the insured warranted the truth of the answers as they appeared in the application, and, further, that if untrue the policy should be null and void. Unless the right of insurance companies and individuals to contract with each other as they will may be abridged by the courts, this judgment must be affirmed. That the legislature may provide a standard form for life insurance policies is unquestioned, but the power is legislative, and no attempt should be made indirectly to exercise it by the courts, which would best discharge their duty in the end, as experience proves, by giving full force and effect to the contracts of all parties.

The method by which the plaintiff sought to relieve the contract from the effect of the several untrue answers in the application upon which the defendant acted was to prove that the insured made very different answers to Dr. Langley, the physician who undertook to write down the replies; to prove, in fact, that the insured told Dr. Langley everything which the defendant has now proved about his physical condition, and then to ask the court to hold, notwithstanding the insured had contracted to the contrary, that Dr. Langley was the defendant's agent, and hence that the defendant is estopped from denying that it knew the whole truth about the insured's prior state of life. The defendant's counsel contended (and so far the courts have sustained him) that his client had issued its policy in reliance on the truth of the statements contained in the application, and that Sternaman, the applicant, had in terms contracted that it might do so, and that, if any of the answers should prove to be untrue, it should render the policy null and void. He asserted the right of his client to the protection of the law in the enforcement of its contract, and pointed out the necessity, according to his client's view, of the incorporation into such contracts of a provision that the applicant for insurance shall be held to warrant the truth of all answers, no matter by whom written, and although the writer be in the service of the company. The reasons presented in support of defendant's contention are briefly stated in the language of Mr. Justice Williams in Bernard v. United L. Ins. Assn. 14 App. Div. 142, 43 N. Y. Supp. 527, in which all his associates concurred. The aim of the defendant is by its policy "to protect itself in two respects: First, against any attempt by the agent and the insured, conspiring together, to defraud the company by presenting to it an application containing false statements and answers, and securing a policy thereon, which would not have been issued if the truth has been known to the company; second, against any attempt by the beneficiary, after the death of the assured, by parol evidence to avoid the effect of false statements and answers in an application upon which a policy was actually issued." These reasons seem to be well grounded; for it is not in the public interest that frauds should be permitted for the benefit of individuals, however needy they may be. But it matters not whether the reasons be sound or not, the defendant has a right to issue policies of insurance to such persons and upon such terms as it chooses, so long as it violates no provision of law; and he who would be insured must accept its contracts upon its own terms, or go elsewhere for his insurance. These parties agreed that, for the purposes of the application for the policy of insurance, the medical examiner who wrote down the answers was to be regarded by both parties as the agent of the applicant; and one of the objects of that stipulation was to assure the defendant that it could rely upon the truth of the answers contained in the application, and that it could issue a policy without fear that it might afterwards be claimed that it was bound by some information that its agent had obtained that was in conflict with the answers in the application. And this does not seem at all unfair to the applicant, for he signs the application, and is carefully advised of the importance of the truth of his answers, while it is certainly no more than fair to the defendant that it should have the whole truth before it when determining whether the risk is one that it should accept. But in any event the defendant has the right to insist, as a condition of its issuing the policy, that an applicant shall agree that, for the purposes of the application and the issuance of the policy, whoever fills up the blanks, whether he be in the employ of the defendant, or a soliciting agent, or one occasionally paid by it for making a medical examination, shall for that purpose be deemed the agent of the applicant. If the applicant does not care to so agree, he need not make the application. But if he does make it, and incorporates that agreement into his application, and upon the strength of it the policy is issued, he is bound by it, and the defendant is entitled to the full protection of it; and so this court and the Supreme Court of the United States have unvaryingly held.

Rohrbach v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 62 N. Y. 47, 20 Am. Rep. 451, was an action on a policy issued for insurance against fire. The 57 L. R. A.

facts stated in the application were by its terms made warranties, as stated therein. They proved to be untrue, and it was held that a recovery could not be had, although the applicant had truly stated the facts to the agent who filled up the application; and the reason for it was, as in this case, that the policy provided, in effect, that the agent should be deemed the agent of the insured, and not of the company, and it was held that the knowledge of the agent was immaterial, and could not affect the warranty. In the course of the opinion the court said: "It is hereupon urged by the plaintiff that the errors and omissions were those of the defendant. But the plaintiff and defendant have in the policy, the contract between them, expressly agreed that Brand should be deemed the agent of the plaintiff, and not of the defendant, under any circumstances.

But we must take the contracts of the parties as we find them, and enforce them as they read. By the one before us the plaintiff has so fettered himself as to be unable to retain, as the case now stands, the real essence of his agreement. Though he has frankly and fully laid before the actor between him and the defendant all the facts and circumstances of the case, he is made responsible for error in legal conclusions which he never formed, and which were arrived at by one in whom he trusted, and whom he supposed to stand in the place of the defendant. . . . Held to the letter and substance of his contract, the plaintiff made a breach of a warranty and condition precedent, upon the truth of which his contract rested, and for that reason may not recover in this action, as the facts now stand." The Rohrbach Case was followed by the Alexander Case, 66 N. Y. 464, 23 Am. Rep. 76. That contract contained the following clause: "It is a part of this contract that any person other than the assured, who may have procured this insurance to be taken by this company, shall be deemed to be the agent of the assured named in this policy, and not of this company, under any circumstances whatever, or in any transaction relating to this insurance." The court (Judge Rapallo writing), on the assumption, as he said, that the agent, Brewster, was the agent of the company for the purposes of the application, said: "But the policy now in question contains an express agreement that any person other than the assured, who may have procured the insurance to be taken by the company, shall be deemed to be the agent of the assured, and not of the company, under any circumstances whatever, or in any transaction relating to the insurance. In Rohrbach v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 62 N. Y. 47, 20 Am. Rep. 451, this court decided that such a clause was operative, and precluded the insured from claiming that the company was bound by the knowledge of a similar agent through whom a policy had been procured."

The last utterance on the subject in this court is to be found in the Allen Case, 123 N. Y. 6, 25 N. E. 309. In that case, as in this one, the court was asked to draw the inference of fact that the person who did the writing was the agent of the company (notwithstanding the stipulation that he should be deemed the agent of the applicant for all the purposes of the contract), and to thrust its inference of fact into the contract in the place of the provision declaring him to be the agent of the insured. But the court repudiated the plaintiff's claim, saying, among other things (Judge Gray writing): "Then, too, the policy contained the provisions that the company would not be bound by any acts of, or statements of or to, any agent or other person, which were not contained in the policy; and, further, that any person other than the assured procuring the policy, or any renewal thereof, should be deemed the agent of the assured, and not of the company. To these conditions the plaintiff's assent is presumed to have been given by his acceptance of the policy, and there is no reason why he should not be bound by them. If Noble had been the agent of the defendant, it was perfectly competent to stipulate by this contract of insurance that anything done by or known to the agent should be without effect upon the contract, unless made known in writing to the principal,"—citing authorities above quoted. The parties were competent to make that stipulation, said this court in that case; but they are not competent to make the stipulation in this case, it is now said. No attempt, however, is made to give a reason for holding that the parties are competent to make one, but not the other. None can be given, I assume, that will persuade any mind. A reversal in this case will, as a matter of fact, overrule Allen's Case; and it would seem as if the court's assertion in that case of competency on the part of the parties to contract as they did should be opposed with something more than a contrary assertion in this case; that, at least, the court should point out what it is that prevents two men of sound mind, dealing with each other honestly, from agreeing that for all the purposes of a particular contract a person who shall act as the agent for one shall be deemed the agent of the other.
